

Library of the Theological Seminary

PRINCETON, N. J.

From the Library of Dr. James McCosh.

Division..... SCC

Section 2893

v. 3

SERMONS

BY

J. B. MASSILLON,

BISHOP OF CLERMONT.

SELECTED AND TRANSLATED

BY

WILLIAM DICKSON;

AND

DEDICATED, BY PERMISSION, TO

HER GRACE

THE DUTCHESS OF BUCCLEUGH.

VOLUME THIRD.

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED FOR ROBERT MORISON AND SON, BOOKSELLERS, PERTH;
ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE, EDINBURGH; AND BRASH AND REID, GLASGOW.

1798.

CONTENTS.

SERM.	PAGE.
I. The Truth of Religion, - -	9
II. Doubts upon Religion, - -	49
III. Evidence of the Law of God, -	88
IV. Immutability of the Law of God, -	127
V. For Christmas Day, - -	157
VI. For the Day of the Epiphany, -	189
VII. The Divinity of Jesus Christ, -	237
VIII. On the Resurrection of Lazarus,	293
IX. On the Day of Judgment, -	334
X. The Happiness of the Just, -	376
XI. On the Dispositions for the Communion,	412

SERMON I.

THE TRUTH OF RELIGION.

MATTHEW viii. 10.

Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel.

WHENCE came then the incredulity with which Jesus Christ at present reproaches the Jews; and what cause could they still have for doubting the sanctity of his doctrine and the truth of his ministry? They had demanded miracles, and, before their eyes, he had wrought such evident ones, that no person before him had done the like. They had wished that his mission were authorized by testimonies; Moses and the prophets had amply borne them to him; the precursor had openly proclaimed, Behold the Christ and the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world; a gentile renders glory in our gospel to his almightiness; the heavenly Father had declared from on high, that it was his well-beloved Son; lastly, the demons themselves, struck with his sanctity, quitted the bodies, in confessing that he was the Holy, and the Son of the living God. What could the incredulity of the Jews still oppose to so many proofs and prodigies?

Behold, my brethren, what, with much greater surprize, might be demanded at those unbelieving minds, who, after the fulfilment of all that had been foretold, after the consummation of the mysteries of Jesus Christ, the exaltation of his name, the manifestation of his gifts, the calling of his people, the destruction of idols, the conversion of Cæsars, and the agreement of the universe, still doubt, and take upon themselves to confute and to overthrow what the toils of the apostolic men, the blood of so many martyrs, the prodigies of so many servants of Jesus Christ, the writings of so many great men, the austerities of so many holy anchorites, and the religion of seventeen hundred years, have so universally and so divinely established in the mind of almost all people.

For, my brethren, amid all the triumphs of faith, children of unbelief still privately spring up among us, whom God hath delivered up to the vanity of their own thoughts, and who blaspheme what they know not; impious men, who change, as the apostle says, the grace of our God into wantonness, defile

defile their flesh, contemn all rule, blaspheme majesty, corrupt all their ways like the animals not gifted with reason, and are set apart to serve one day as an example of the awful judgments of God upon men.

Now if, among so many believers assembled here through religion, any soul of this description should happen to be, allow me, you, my brethren, who preserve with respect the sacred trust of the doctrine which you have received from your ancestors and from your pastors, to seize this opportunity, either of undeceiving them, or of confuting their incredulity. Allow me, for once, to do here what the first pastors of the church so often did before their assembled people, that is to say, to take upon myself the defence of the religion of Jesus Christ against unbelief; and, before entering into the particulars of your duties during this long term, allow me to begin by laying the first foundations of faith. It is so consoling for those who believe to find how reasonable their submission is, and to be convinced that faith, which is apparently the rock of reason, is however its only consolation, guide, and refuge!

Here then is my whole design. The unbeliever refuses submission to the revealed truths, either through a vain affectation of reason, or through a false sentiment of pride, or through an ill-placed love of independance.

Now, I mean at present to shew, that the submission which the unbeliever refuses, through a vain affectation affectation of reason, is the most prudent use which he can make even of reason; that the submission which he refuses through a false sentiment of pride, is the most glorious step of it; and, lastly, that the submission which he rejects through an ill-placed love of independance, is the most indispensable sacrifice of it. And from thence I shall draw the three great characters of religion: It is reasonable, it is glorious, it is necessary.

O my Saviour, eternal author and finisher of our faith, defend thyself, thy doctrine. Suffer not that thy cross, by which the universe hath been submitted to thee, be still the folly and the scandal of proud minds. Once more triumph at present, through the secret wonders of thy grace, over that same unbelief which thou formerly triumphedst over through the striking operations of thy power; and by those lively lights, which enlighten hearts, more efficacious than all our discourses, destroy every sentiment of pride which may still rise up against the knowledge of thy mysteries.

PART I. Let us begin with admitting that it is faith, and not reason, which makes Christians; and that the first step exacted of a disciple of Jesus Christ, is to captivate his mind, and to believe what he may not comprehend. Nevertheless, I say, that we are led to that submission by reason itself; that the more even our lights are superior, the more do they point out the necessity of our submission; and that unbelief, far from being the party

party of strength of mind, and of reason, is, on the contrary, that of error and weakness.

In faith, reason hath therefore its uses, as it hath its limits : and as the law, good and holy in itself, served however only to conduct to Jesus Christ, and there stopped as at its term ; in the same way reason, good and just in itself, since it is the gift of God, and a participation of the sovereign reason, ought only to serve, and is given to us for the sole purpose of preparing the way for faith. It is forward, and quits the bounds of its first institution, when it attempts to go beyond these sacred limits.

This taken for granted, let us see which of the two, viz. the believer or the unbeliever, makes the most prudent use of his reason. Submission to things held out to our belief, perhaps suspected of credulity, either on the side of the authority which proposes them ; if it be light, it is weakness to give credit to them ; or on the side of the things of which they wish to persuade us ; if they be in opposition to the principles of equity, of honour, of society, and of conscience, it is ignorance to receive them as true ; or, lastly, on the side of the motives which are employed to persuade us ; if they be vain, frivolous, and incapable of determining a wise mind, it is imprudence to give way to them. Now, it is easy to prove that the authority which exacts the submission of the believer, is the greatest, the most respectable, and the best established, which can possibly be upon the earth ; that the truths proposed to his belief are the only ones conformable to the principles of equity, of honour, of society, and of conscience; and, lastly, that the motives employed to persuade him are the most decisive, the most triumphant, and the most proper to gain submission from the least credulous minds.
the

When I speak of the authority of the Christian religion, I do not pretend to confine the extent of that term to the single authority of its holy assemblies, in which, through the mouths of its pastors, the church makes decisions, and holds out to all believers the infallible rules of worship and of doctrine. As it is not heresy, but unbelief, which this discourse concerns. I do not here so much consider religion as opposed to the sects which the spirit of error hath separated from the unity, that is to say, as confined to the sole catholic church, but as forming, since the beginning of the world, a society apart, sole depositary of the knowledge of a God, and of the promise of a Mediator; always opposed to all the religions which have since arisen in the universe; always contradicted, and always the same; and I say that its authority bears along with it such shining characters of truth, that it is impossible, without folly, to refuse submission to it.

In the first place, in matter of religion, antiquity is a character which reason respects; and we may say, that a prepossession is already formed in favour of that belief, consecrated by the religion of the first men, and by the simplicity of the primitive times times. Not but what falsehood is often decked out with the same titles, and that old errors exist among men, which seem to contest the antiquity of their origin with the truth; but it is not difficult, to whoever wishes to trace their history, to go back even to their origin. Novelty is always the constant and most inseparable character of error: and the reproach of the prophet may alike be made to them all: "They sacrifice to new gods

" that come newly up, whom their fathers feared
" not."

In effect, if there be a true religion upon the earth, it must be the most ancient of all; for, if there be a true religion upon the earth, it must be the first and the most essential duty of man towards the God who wishes to be honoured by it. This duty must therefore be equally ancient as man; and, as it is attached to his nature, it must, as I may say, be born with him. And this, my brethren, is the first character by which the religion of Christians is at once distinguished from superstitions and sects. It is the most ancient religion in the world. The first men, before that an impious worship was carved out of divinities of wood and of stone, worshipped the same God whom we adore, raised up altars and offered sacrifices to him, expected from his liberality the reward of their virtue, and from his justice the punishment of their disobedience. The history of the birth of this religion, is the history of the birth of the world itself.

The

The divine books which have preserved it down to us, contain the first monuments of the origin of things. They are themselves more ancient than all those fabulous productions of the human mind, which afterwards so miserably amused the credulity of the following ages; and as error ever springs from the truth, and is only a faulty imitation of it, all the fables of paganism are founded on some of the principal features of that divine history; in so much that it may be affirmed that every thing, even to error itself, renders homage to the antiquity and to the authority of our holy scriptures.

Now, my brethren, is there not already something respectable in this character alone? The other religions, which have vaunted a more ancient origin, have produced nothing, in support of their antiquity, but fabulous legends, which sunk into nothing of themselves. They have disfigured the history of the world by a chaos of innumerable and imaginary ages, of which no event hath been left to posterity, and which the history of the world hath never known. The authors of these gross fictions did not write till many ages after the actions which they relate, and it is saying every thing to add, that that theology was the fruit of poesy; and the inventions of that art, the most solid foundations of their religion.

Here, it is a train of facts, reasonable, natural, and in agreement with itself. It is the history of a family continued from its first head down to him him who writes it, and authenticated in all its circumstances. It is a genealogy in which every chief is characterised by his own actions, by events which still subsisted then, by marks which were still known in the places where they had dwelt. It is a living tradition, the most authenticated upon the earth, since Moses hath written only what he had heard from the children of the patriarchs, and they related only what their fathers had seen. Every part of it is coherent, hangs properly together, and tends to clear up the whole. The features are not copied, nor the adventures drawn from elsewhere, and accommodated to the subject. Before Moses, the people of God had nothing in writing. He hath left nothing to posterity but what he had verbally collected from his ancestors, that is to say, the whole tradition of mankind; and the first, he hath comprised in one volume, the history of God's wonders and of his manifestations to men, the remembrance of which had till then composed the whole religion, the whole knowledge, and the whole consolation of the family of Abraham. The candour and sincerity of this author appear in the simplicity of his history. He takes no precaution to secure belief, because he supposes that those for whom he writes require none to believe; and all the facts which he relates being well-known among them, it is more for the purpose of preserving them to their posterity, than for any instruction in them to themselves.

Behold, my brethren, which way the Christian religion begins to acquire influence over the mind of men. Turn on all sides, read the history of every people and of every nation, and you will find nothing so well established upon the earth: What do I say? You will find nothing more worthy the attention of a rational mind. If men be born for a religion, they are born for this one alone. If there be a Supreme Being who hath manifested the truth to men, this alone is worthy of men and of him. Every where else the origin is fabulous; here it is equally certain as all the rest; and the latter ages, which cannot be disputed, are, however, only the proofs of the certitude of the first. Therefore, if there be an authority upon the earth to which reason ought to yield, it is to that of the Christian religion.

To the character of its antiquity must be added that of its perpetuity. Figure to yourselves here that endless variety of sects and of religions which have successively reigned upon the earth: Follow the history of the superstitions of every people and of every country; they have flourished a few years, and afterwards sunk into oblivion along with the power of their followers. Where are the gods of Emath, of Arphad, and of Sepharvaim? Recollect the history of those first conquerors: In conquering the people, they conquered the gods of the people; and, in overturning their power, they overturned their worship. How beautiful, my brethren, brethren, to see the religion of our fathers alone maintaining itself from the first, surviving all sects; and, notwithstanding the diverse fortunes of those who have professed it, alone passing from father to son, and braving every exertion to efface it from the heart of men! It is not the arm of flesh which hath preserved it. Ah! The people of God hath, almost always, been weak, oppressed, and persecuted. No; it is not, says the prophet, by their own sword that our fathers got the land in possession; but thy right hand, O Lord, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them. One while slaves, another fugitives, and another tributaries of various nations; they a thousand times saw Chaldea, Assyria, Babylon, the most formidable powers of the earth, the whole universe conspire their ruin, and the total extinction of their worship; but this people, so weak, oppressed in Egypt, wandering in the desert, and afterwards carried in captivity into a foreign land, no power hath ever been able to exterminate, while so many others, more powerful, have followed the destiny of human things; and its worship hath always subsisted with itself, in spite of all the efforts made by almost every age to destroy it.

Now, whence comes it, that a worship so contradicted, so arduous in its observances, so rigorous in its punishments upon transgressors, and even so liable to be established or to be overthrown, through the mere inconstancy and ignorance of the people who was its first depositary; whence comes it that it alone hath been perpetuated amid so many revolutions, while the superstitions supported by all the power of empires and of kingdoms, have sunk into their original oblivion? Ah! is it not God, and not man, who hath done all these things? Is it not the arm of the Almighty which hath preserved his work? And since every thing invented by the human mind has perished, is it not to be inferred, that what hath always endured was alone the work of the divine wisdom?
the

Lastly, If to its antiquity and to its perpetuity, you add its uniformity, no pretext for resistance will be left to reason. For, my brethren, every thing changes upon the earth, because every thing follows the mutability of its origin. Occasions, the differences of ages, the diverse humours of climates, and the necessity of the times, have introduced a thousand changes in all the human laws. Faith alone hath never changed. Such as our fathers received it, such have we it at present, and such shall our descendants one day receive it. It hath been unfolded through the course of ages, and likewise, I confess, through the necessity of securing it from the errors which have been attempted to be introduced into it; but every thing which once appeared to belong to it, hath always appeared as appertaining to it. There is little wonder in the duration of a religion, when accommodations are made to times and to conjunc-tures,

tures, and when they may add or diminish according to the fancy of the ages, and of those who govern; but never to relax, in spite of the change of manners and of times; to see every thing change around, and yet be always the same, is the grand privilege of the Christian religion. And by these three characters, of antiquity, of perpetuity, and of uniformity, which exclusively belong to it, its authority is the only one upon the earth capable of determining a wise mind.

But if the submission of the believer be reasonable on the part of the authority which exacts it, it is not less so on the part of the things which are proposed to his belief. And here, my brethren, let us enter into the foundation of the Christian worship. It is not afraid of investigation, like those abominable mysteries of idolatry, the infamy and horror of which were concealed by the darkest obscurity. A religion, says Tertullian, which would shun examination, and would dread being searched into, should ever be suspected. The more the Christian worship is investigated, the more are beauties and hidden wonders found in it. Idolatry inspired man with foolish sentiments of the Divinity: philosophy, with very unreasonable ones of himself: cupidity, with iniquitous ones towards the rest of men. Now, admire the wisdom of religion, which remedies all these three evils, which the reason of all ages had never been able either to eradicate or even to find out.

And,

And, 1^{stly}, what other legislator hath spoken of the divinity, like that of the Christians? Find elsewhere if you can, more sublime ideas of his power, of his immensity, of his wisdom, of his grandeur, and of his justice, than those which are given us in our scriptures. If there be over us a supreme and eternal Being, in whom all things live, he must be such as the Christian religion represents him. We alone compare him not to the likeness of man. We alone worship him seated above the cherubims, filling every where with his presence, regulating all by his wisdom, creating light and darkness, author of good, and punisher of vice. We alone honour him as he wishes to be honoured; that it is to say, we make not the worship due to him, to consist in the multitude of victims, nor in the external pomp of our homages; but in adoration, in love, in praise, and in thanksgiving. We refer to him the good which is in us, as to its principle; and we always attribute vice to ourselves, which takes its rise only in our corruption. We hope to find in him the reward of a fidelity, which is the gift of his grace, and the punishment of transgressions, which are always the consequence of the bad use which we make of our liberty. Now, what can be more worthy of the supreme Being than all these ideas!

2^{dly}, A vain philosophy either had degraded man to the level of the beast, by centering his felicity in the senses; or had foolishly exalted him
even

even to the likeness of God, by persuading him that he might find his own happiness in his own wisdom. Now, the Christian morality avoids these two extremes: it withdraws man from carnal pleasures, by discovering to him the excellency of his nature, and the holiness of his destination; it corrects his pride, by making him sensible of his own wretchedness and meanness.

Lastly, cupidity rendered man unjust towards the rest of men. Now, what other doctrine than that of Christians, hath ever so well regulated our duties on this head. It instructs us to yield obedience to the powers established by God, not only through fear of their authority, but through an obligation of conscience; to respect our superiors, to bear with our equals, to be affable towards our inferiors, to love all men as ourselves. It alone is capable of forming good citizens, faithful subjects, patient servants, humble masters, incorruptible magistrates, clement princes, and zealous friends. It alone renders the honour of marriage inviolable, secures the peace of families, and maintains the tranquility of states. It not only checks usurpations, but it prohibits even the desire of others property; it not only requires us, not to view with an envious eye the prosperity of our brother, but it commands us to share our own riches with him, if need require; it not only forbids us to attempt his life, but it requires us to do good, even to those who injure us; to bless those who curse us, and to be all only of one heart and of one mind. Give me, said formerly St Augustin to the heathens of his time, a kingdom all composed of people of this kind: Good God, what peace! what felicity! What a representation of heaven upon the earth! Have all the ideas of philosophy ever come near to the plan of this heavenly republic? And is it not true, that if a God hath spoken to men, to lay open to them the ways of salvation, he could never have held any other language?
be

To all these maxims, so worthy of reason, it is true, that religion adds mysteries which exceed our comprehension. But, besides that good sense should induce us to yield thereon to a religion so venerable through its antiquity, so divine in its morality, so superior to every thing on the earth in its authority, and alone worthy of being believed, the motives it employs for our persuasion are sufficient to conquer unbelief.

1^{stly}, These mysteries were foretold many ages before their accomplishment, and foretold with every circumstance of times and places; nor are they vague prophecies, referred to the credulity of the vulgar alone, uttered in a corner of the earth, of the same age as the events, and unknown to the rest of the universe. They are prophecies which, from the beginning of the world, have constituted the religion of an entire people; which fathers transmitted to their children as their most precious inheritance; which were preserved in the holy temple

temple as the most sacred pledge of the divine promises ; and, lastly, to the truth of which the nation most inveterate against Jesus Christ, and their first depository, still at present bears witness in the face of the whole universe : prophecies, which were not mysteriously hidden from the people, lest their falsehood should be betrayed ; like those vain oracles of the Sybils, carefully shut up in the capitol, fabricated to support the Roman pride, exposed to the view of the pontiffs alone, and produced, piece-meal, from time to time, to authorise, in the mind of the people, either a dangerous enterprise, or an unjust war. On the contrary, our prophetic books were the daily study of a whole people. The young and the old, women and children, priests and men of all ranks, princes and subjects, were indispensibly obliged to have them continually in their hands ; every one was entitled to study his duties there, and to discover his hopes. Far from flattering their pride, they held forth only the ingratitude of their fathers ; in every page they announced misfortunes to them as the just punishment of their crimes ; to kings they reproached their dissipations, to the pontiffs their profusion, to the people their inconstancy and unbelief ; and, nevertheless, these holy books were dear to them ; and, from the oracles which they saw continually accomplishing in them, they awaited with confidence the fulfilment of those which the whole universe hath now witnessed. Now, the knowledge of what is to come is the least suspicious character of the divinity.

2dly, These mysteries are founded upon facts so evidently miraculous, so well-known in Judea, so agreed to then, even by those whose interest it was to reject them, so signalised by events which interested the whole nation, so often repeated in the cities, in the country, in the temple, and in the public places, that the eyes must be shut against the light to call them in question. The apostles have preached them, have written them, even in Judea, a very short time after their fulfilment; that is to say, in a time when the pontiffs, who had condemned Jesus Christ, still living, might so easily have controverted and proclaimed their imposture, had they really been a deception upon mankind. Jesus Christ, by fulfilling his promise of rising again, confirmed his gospel, and it is not to be supposed either, that the apostles could be deceived on a fact so decisive and so essential for them; on that fact so often foretold, and looked forward to, as the principal point on which all the rest was to turn; that fact so often confirmed, and that before so many witnesses; nor that they themselves wished to deceive us, and to preach a falsehood to men at the expence of their own ease, honour, and life, the only return which they had to expect for their imposture. Would these men, who have left to us only such pious and wise precepts, have given to the earth an example of folly hitherto unknown to every every people, and without view, interest, or motive, have coolly devoted themselves to the most excruciating tortures, and to a death suffered with the most heroical piety, merely to maintain the truth of a thing, of which they themselves knew the falsehood? Would these men have all tranquilly submitted to death for the sake of another man who had deceived them, and who, having failed in his promise of rising again from the grave, had only imposed, during life, upon their credulity and weakness: Let the impious man no longer reproach to us, as a credulity, the incomprehensible mysteries of faith. He must be very credulous himself, to be able to persuade himself of the possibility of suppositions so absurd.

Lastly, The whole universe hath been docile to the faith of these mysteries; the Cæsars, whom it degraded from the rank of gods; the philosophers, whom it convicted of ignorance and vanity; the voluptuous, to whom it preached self-denial and sufferance; the rich, whom it obliged to poverty and humility; the poor, whom it commanded to love even their abjection and indigence; all men, of whom it combatted all the passions. This faith, preached by twelve poor men without learning, talents, or support, hath subjected emperors, the learned equally as the illiterate, cities and empires; mysteries apparently so absurd, have overthrown all the sects, and all the monuments of a proud reason, and the folly of the cross hath been wiser than than all the wisdom of the age. The whole universe hath conspired against it, and every effort of its enemies, hath only added fresh confirmation to it. To be a believer, and to be destined to death, were two things inseparable; yet the danger was only an additional charm; the more the persecutions were violent, the more progress did faith make; and the blood of the martyrs was the seed of believers. O God! who doth not feel thy finger here? Who, in these traits, would not acknowledge the character of thy work? Where is the reason which doth not feel the vanity of its doubts to sink into nothing here, and which still blushes to submit to a doctrine, to which the whole universe hath yielded? But not only is this submission reasonable, it is likewise glorious to men.

PART II. Pride is the secret source of unbelief. In that ostentation of reason, which induces the unbeliever to condemn the common belief, there is a deplorable singularity which flatters him, and occasions him to suppose in himself more vigour of mind and more light than in the rest of men, because he boldly ventures to cast off a yoke to which they have all submitted, and to stand up against what all the rest had hitherto been contented to worship.

Now, in order to deprive the unbeliever of so wretched a consolation, it is only necessary to demonstrate, in the first place, that nothing is more glorious to reason than faith; glorious on the side of its promises for the future ; glorious from the situation in which it places the believer for the present ; lastly, glorious from the grand models which it holds out to his imitation.
of

Glorious on the side of the promises contained in it. What are the promises of faith, my brethren ? The adoption of God, an immortal society with him, the complete redemption of our bodies, the eternal felicity of our souls, freedom from the passions, our hearts fixed by the possession of the true riches, our minds penetrated with the ineffable light of the sovereign reason, and happy in the clear and always durable view of the truth. Such are the promises of faith ; it informs us that our origin is divine, and our hopes eternal.

Now, I ask, is it disgraceful to reason to believe truths which do such honour to the immortality of its nature ? What, my brethren, would it then be more glorious to man to believe himself of the same nature as the beasts, and to look forward to the same end ? What, the unbeliever would think himself more honoured by the conviction that he is only a vile clay, put together by chance, and which chance shall dissolve, without end, destination, hope, or any other use of his reason and of his body, than that of brutally plunging himself, like the brutes, into carnal gratifications ! What, he would have a higher opinion of himself, when viewed in the light of an unfortunate wretch, accidentally placed upon the earth, who looks forward ward to nothing beyond life, whose sweetest hope is that of sinking back to nonentity, who relates to nothing but himself, and is reduced to find his felicity in himself, though he can there find only anxieties and secret terrors! Is this then that miserable distinction by which the pride of unbelief is so much flattered? Great God! How glorious to thy truth, to have no enemies but men of this character! For my part, as St Ambrose formerly said to the unbelievers of his time, I glory in believing truths so honourable to man, and in expecting the fulfilment of promises so consolatory. To refuse belief to them, is forrily to punish one's self. Ah! if I be deceived, in preferring the hope of one day enjoying the eternal society of the righteous in the bosom of God to the humbling belief of being of the same nature as the beasts, it is an error dear to me, which I delight in, and upon which I wish never to be undeceived.

But, if faith be glorious on the side of its promises for the future, it is not less so from the situation in which it places the believer for the present. And here, my brethren, figure to yourselves a truly righteous man, who lives by faith, and you will acknowledge that there is nothing on the earth more sublime. Master of his desires and of all the movements of his heart; exercising a glorious empire over himself; in patience and in equanimity enjoying his soul, and regulating all his passions by the bridle of temperance; humble in prosperity, firm under misfortunes, cheerful in tribulations, peaceful with those who hate peace, callous to injuries, feeling for the afflictions of those who trespass against him, faithful in his promises, religious in his friendships, and unshaken in his duties; little affected with riches, which he contemns; fatigued with honours, which he dreads; greater than the whole world, which he considers only as a mass of earth: what dignity!

firm

Philosophy conquered one vice only by another. It pompously taught contempt of the world, merely to attract the applauses of the world; it sought more the glory of wisdom, than wisdom itself. In destroying the other passions, it continually, upon their ruins, raised up one much more dangerous; I mean to say pride: Like that prince of Babylon who overthrew the altars of the national gods, merely to exalt upon their wrecks his own impious statue, and that monstrous colossus of pride which he wanted the whole earth to worship.

But faith exalts the just man above even his virtue. Through it he is still greater in the secrecy of his heart, and in the eyes of God, than before men. He forgives without pride; he is disinterested without shew; he suffers without wishing it to be known; he moderates his passions without perceiving it himself; he alone is ignorant of the glory and of the merit of his actions; far from graciously looking upon himself, he is ashamed of his virtues much more than the sinner is of his vices;

vices ; far from courting applause, he hides his works from the light, as if they were deeds of darkness ; love of duty is the sole spring of his virtue ; he acts under the eyes of God alone, and as if there were no longer men upon the earth ; what dignity ! Find, if you can, any thing greater in the universe. Review all the various kinds of glory with which the world gratifies the vanity of men ; and see, if, all together, they can bestow that degree of dignity to which the godly are raised by faith.

Now, my dear hearer, what more honourable to man than this situation ? Do you consider him as more glorious, more respectable, more grand, when he follows the impulses of a brutal instinct ; when he is the slave of hatred, revenge, voluptuousness, ambition, envy, and all those other monsters which alternately reign in his heart ?

For, are you who make a boast of unbelief thoroughly acquainted with what is an unbeliever ? He is a man without morals, probity, faith, or character, who owns no rule but his passions, no law but his iniquitous thoughts, no master but his desires, no check but the dread of authority, no God but himself ; an unnatural child, seeing he believes that chance alone hath given him fathers ; a faithless friend, seeing he looks upon men merely as the wretched fruits of a wild and fortuitous concurrence, to whom he is connected only by transitory ties ; a cruel master, seeing he is convinced that the strongest and the most fortunate have always reason on their side. For, who could henceforth place any dependence upon you? You no longer fear a God; you no longer respect men; you look forward to nothing after this life; virtue and vice are merely prejudices of education in your eyes, and the consequences of popular credulity. Adulteries, revenge, blasphemies, the blackest treacheries, abominations which we dare not even to name, are no longer, in your opinion, but human prohibitions, and regulations established through the policy of legislators. According to you, the most horrible crimes, or the purest virtues, are all equally the same, since an eternal annihilation shall soon equalise the just and the impious, and for ever confound them both in the dreary mansion of the tomb. What a monster must you then be upon the earth? Does this representation of you highly gratify your pride, or can you support even its idea?
that

Besides, you pride yourself upon irreligion, as springing from your superiority of mind; but trace it to its source. What hath led you to free-thinking? Is it not the corruption of your heart? Would you have ever thought of impiety had you been able to ally religion with your pleasures? You began to hesitate upon a doctrine which incommoded your passions; and you have marked it down as false from the moment that you found it irksome. You have anxiously fought to persuade yourself what you had such an interest to believe ; that all died with us ; that eternal punishments were merely the terrors of education ; that inclinations born with us could never be crimes ; what know I ? And all those maxims of free thinking originating from hell. We are easily persuaded of what we wish. Solomon worshipped the gods of foreign women only to quiet himself in his debaucheries. If men had never had passions, or if religion had countenanced them, unbelief would never have appeared upon the earth. And a proof that what I say is true, is that, in the moments when you are disgusted with guilt, you imperceptibly turn towards religion ; in the moments when your passions are more cool, your doubts diminish ; you render, as if in spite of yourself, a secret homage in the bottom of your heart to the truth of faith ; in vain you try to weaken it, you cannot succeed in extinguishing it ; at the first signal of death, you raise your eyes towards heaven, you acknowledge the God whose finger is upon you, you cast yourself upon the bosom of your Father, and the Author of your being ; you tremble over a futurity which you had vaunted not to believe ; and, humbled under the hand of the Almighty, on the point of falling upon and crushing you like a worm of the earth, you confess that he is alone great, alone wise, alone immortal, and that man is only vanity and lies.

Lastly,

Lastly, If fresh proofs were necessary to my subject, I could prove to you how glorious faith is to man on the side of the grand models which it holds out for our imitation. Consider Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, said formerly the Jews to their children. Consider the holy men who have gone before you, to whom their faith hath merited so honourable a testimony, said formerly St Paul to the faithful, after having related to them, in that beautiful chapter of his epistle to the Hebrews, their names, and the most wonderful circumstances of their history, from age to age.

Behold the excellency of the Christian faith. Recollect all the great men which, in all ages, have submitted to it; such magnanimous princes, such religious conquerors, such venerable pastors, such enlightened philosophers, such estimable learned men, wits so vaunted in their age, such noble martyrs, such penitent anchorites, such pure and constant virgins, heroes in every description of virtue. Philosophy preached a pompous wisdom; but its sage was no where to be found. Here what a cloud of witnesses! What an uninterrupted tradition of Christian heroes from the blood of Abel down to us!

Now, I ask, shall you blush to tread in the steps of so many illustrious names? Place on the one side all the great men whom, in all ages, religion hath given to the world, and on the other, that small number of black and desperate minds whom unbelief

unbelief hath produced. Doth it appear more honourable for you to rank yourself among the latter party? To adopt for guides, and for your models, those men whose names are only recollected with horror, those monsters whom it hath pleased providence to permit, that nature should, from time to time, bring forth; or the Abrahams, the Josephs, the Moseses, the Davids, the apostolic men, the righteous of ancient and of modern times? Support, if you can, this comparison. Ah! said formerly St Jerome on a different occasion, if you believe me in error, it is glorious for me to be deceived with such guides.

And here, my brethren, leaving unbelievers for a moment, allow me to address myself to you. Avowed unbelief is a vice perhaps rare among us; but the simplicity of faith is not perhaps less so. We would feel a horror at quitting the belief of our fathers; but we wish to refine upon our sincerity. We do not permit ourselves to doubt upon the main part of the mysteries; but obedience is philosophically given, by imposing our own yoke, by weighing the holy truths, receiving some as reasonable, reasoning upon others, and measuring them by our own feeble lights; and our age, more than any other, is full of these half believers, who, under the pretext of taking away from religion all that credulity or prejudice may have added to it, deprive faith of the whole merit of submission.

Now,

Now, my brethren, sanctity ought only to be spoken of with a religious circumspection. Faith is a virtue almost equally delicate as modesty: a single doubt, a single word injures it; a breath, as I may say, tarnishes it. Yet, nevertheless, what licence do they not allow themselves in modern conversations upon all that is most respectable in the faith of our fathers? Alas! the terrible name of the Lord could not be even pronounced under the law by the mouth of man; and, at present, all that is most sacred and most august in religion, is become a common subject of worldly conversations: there every thing is talked over, and freely decided upon. Vain and superficial men, whose only knowledge of religion consists of a little more temerity than the illiterate and the common people; producing, as their whole stock of learning, some common-place and hackneyed doubts, which they have picked up, but never had formed themselves; doubts which have so often been cleared up, that they seem now to exist no longer but to glorify the truth; men who, amid the most dissolute manners, have never devoted an hour of serious attention to the truth of religion, act the philosopher, and boldly decide upon points which a whole life of study, accompanied with learning and piety, could scarcely clear up.

Even persons of a sex, in whom ignorance on certain points would be meritorious, and who, though knowing, good-breeding and decency require quire that they should affect to be ignorant ; persons who are better acquainted with the world than with Jesus Christ ; who even know not of religion what is necessary to regulate their manners, pretend doubts, wish to have them explained, are afraid of believing too much, have suspicions upon the whole, yet have none upon their own miserable situation, and the visible impropriety of their life. O God ! it is thus that thou deliverest up sinners to the vanity of their own fancies, and permittest that those who pretend to penetrate into thine adorable secrecies know not themselves. Faith is therefore glorious to man ; this has just been shewn to you : it now remains for me to prove that it is necessary to him.

PART III. Of all the characters of faith, the necessity of it is the one which renders the unbeliever most inexcusable. All the other motives which are employed to lead him to the truth are foreign, as I may say, to him ; this one is drawn from his own ground-work, I mean to say, from the nature itself of his reason.

Now, I say that faith is absolutely necessary to man, in the gloomy and obscure paths of this life ; for his reason is weak, and it requires to be assisted ; because it is corrupted, and it requires to be cured ; because it is changeable, and it requires to be fixed. Now, faith alone is the aid which assists and enlightens it, the remedy which cures it, the bridle and the rule which retains and fixes it. Yet a moment of attention ; I shall not misemploy it.
 bridle

I say, truly, that reason is weak, and that an aid is necessary to it. Alas ! my brethren, we know not, neither ourselves, nor what is external to us. We are totally ignorant how we have been formed, by what imperceptible progressions our bodies have received arrangement and life, and what are the infinite springs, and the divine skill, which give motion to the whole machine. “ I cannot tell,” said that illustrious mother, mentioned in the Maccabees, to her children, “ how ye came into my womb ; for I neither gave you breath nor life, neither was it I that formed the members of every one of you : but doubtless the Creator of the world, who formed the generation of man, and found out the beginning of all things, will also, of his own mercy, give you breath and life again, as ye now regard not your own selves for his law’s sake.” Our body is itself a mystery, in which the human mind is lost and overwhelmed, and of which the secrets shall never be fathomed ; for there is none but him alone who hath presided at its formation, who is capable of comprehending them.

That breath of the divinity which animates us, that portion of ourselves which renders us capable of loving and of knowing, is not less unknown to us : we are entirely ignorant how its desires, its fears, its hopes, are formed, and how it can give to itself self its ideas and images. No one hath hitherto been able to comprehend how that spiritual being, so different in its nature from matter, hath possibly been united in us with it by such indissoluble ties, that the two substances no longer form but one whole, and the good and evil of the one become the good and evil of the other. We are a mystery therefore to ourselves, as St Augustin formerly said; and we would be difficulted to say, what is even that vain curiosity which pries into every thing, or how it hath been formed in our soul.

In all around us we still find nothing but enigmas; we live as strangers upon the earth, and amid objects which we know not. To man, nature is a closed book; and the Creator, to confound, it would appear, human pride, hath been pleased to overspread the face of this abyss with an impenetrable obscurity.

Lift up thine eyes, O man! Consider those grand luminaries suspended over your head, and which swim, as I may say, through those immense spaces in which thy reason is lost. Who, says Job, hath formed the sun, and given a name to the infinite multitude of stars? Comprehend, if thou can, their nature, their use, their properties, their situation, their distance, their revolutions, the equality or the inequality of their movements. Our age hath penetrated a little into their obscurity, that is to say, it hath a little better conjectured upon them than the preceding ages ; but what are its discoveries, when compared to what we are still ignorant of ?
the

Descend upon the earth, and tell us, if thou know, what it is that keeps the winds bound up ; what regulates the course of the thunders and of the tempests ; what is the fatal boundary which places its mark, and says to the rushing waves, “ Here you shall go, and no farther ;” and how the prodigy so regular of its movements is formed ; explain to us the surprising effects of plants, of metals, of the elements ; find out in what manner gold is purified in the bowels of the earth ; unravel, if thou can, the infinite skill employed in the formation of the very insects which crawl before us ; give us an explanation of the various instincts of animals ; turn on every side ; nature in all her parts offers nothing to thee but enigmas. O man ! thou knowest nothing of the objects, even under thine eyes, and thou wouldst pretend to fathom the eternal depths of faith ? Nature is a mystery to thee, and thou wouldst have a religion which had none ? Thou art ignorant of the secrets of man, and thou wouldst pretend to know the secrets of God ? Thou knowest not thyself, and thou wouldst pretend to fathom what is so much above thee ? The universe, which God hath yielded up to thy curiosity and to thy disputes, is an abyss in which thou art lost ; and thou wouldst that the mysteries of faith, which he hath solely exposed to thy docility and to thy respect, should have nothing which furpasses thy feeble lights? O blindness! were every thing, excepting religion, clear and evident, thou then, with some shew of reason, mightst mistrust its obscurities; but since every thing around thee is a labyrinth in which thou art bewildered, ought not the secret of God, as St Augustin formerly said, to render thee more respectful and more attentive, far from being more incredulous?

The necessity of faith is, therefore, founded, in the first place, upon the weakness of reason; but it is likewise founded upon its profound depravity. And, in effect, what was more natural to man, than to confess his God the author of his being and of his felicity, his end and his principle; than to adore his wisdom, his power, his goodness, and all those divine perfections of which he hath engraven upon his work such profound and evident marks? These lights were born with us. Nevertheless, review all those ages of darkness and of superstition which preceded the gospel, and see how far man had degraded his Creator, and to what he had likened his God. There was no thing so vile in the created world but his impiety erected into gods, and man was the noblest divinity which was worshipped by man.

If, from religion, you pass to the morality, all the principles of natural equity were effaced, and man no longer bore, written in his heart, the work of that law which nature has engraven on it. Plato, even that man so wise, and who, according to St Auguftin, had fo nearly approached to the truth, nevertieles abolifhes the holy inftitution of marriage; and, permitting a brutal confufion among men, he for ever does away all paternal names and rights, which, even in animals, nature hath fo evidently refpected; and gives to the earthmen all uncertain of their origin, all coming into the world without parents, as I may fay; and confequently without ties, tenderness, affection, or humanity; all in a fituation to become inceftuous or parricides, without even knowing it.

Others came to announce to men that voluptuousness was the fovereign good; and whatever might have been the intention of the first author of this sect, it is certain that his disciples fought no other felicity than that of the brutes: the most shameful debaucheries became philosophical maxims. Rome, Athens, Corinth beheld excesses, where, it may be said, that man was no longer man. Even this is nothing; the most abominable vices were consecrated there: temples and altars were erected to them: lasciviousness, incest, cruelty, treachery, and other still more abandoned crimes, were made divinities of: the worship became a public debauch and prostitution; and gods, so criminal, were no longer honoured but by crimes; and the apostle, who relates them to us, takes care to inform us that such was not merely the licentiousness of the people, but of sages and philosophers who had erred in the vanity ty of their own thoughts, and whom God had delivered up to the corruption of their heart. O God! in permitting human reason to fall into such horrible errors, thou intended to let man know, that reason, when delivered up to its own darkness, is capable of every thing, and that it can never take upon itself to be its own guide, without plunging into abysses from which thy law and thy light are alone capable of withdrawing him.

Lastly, If the depravity of reason so evidently expose the necessity of a remedy to cure it, its eternal inconstancies and fluctuations yet more instruct man, that a check and a rule are absolutely requisite to fix it.

And here, my brethren, if the brevity of a discourse would permit all to be said, what vain disputes, what endless questions, what different opinions have formerly engrossed all the schools of the heathen philosophy! And think not that it was upon matters which God seems to have yielded up to the contestation of men; it was upon the nature even of God, upon his existence, upon the immortality of the soul, upon the true felicity.

Some doubted the whole; others believed that they knew every thing. Some denied a God; others gave us one of their own fashioning; that is to say, some of them slothful, an indolent spectator of human things, and tranquilly leaving to chance the management of his own work, as a care unworthy of his greatness, and incompatible with
with

with his conveniency : some others made him the slave of fates, and subject to laws which he had no hand in imposing upon himself : others again incorporated, with the whole universe, the soul of that vast body, and composing, as it were, a part of that world which is entirely his work. Many others of which I know nothing, for I pretend not to recapitulate them all ; but as many schools, so many were the sentiments upon so essential a point. So many ages, so many fresh absurdities upon the immortality and the nature of the soul ; here, it was an assemblage of atoms ; there, a subtile fire ; in another place, a minute and penetrating air ; in another school, a portion of the divinity. Some made it to die with the body ; others would have it to have existed before the body : some again made it to pass from one body to another ; from man to the horse, from the condition of a reasonable being to that of animals without reason. There were some who taught that the true happiness of man is in the senses ; a greater number placed it in the reason ; others again found it only in fame and glory ; many in sloth and indolence. And what is the most deplorable here, is, that the existence of God, his nature, the immortality of the soul, the destination and the happiness of men, all points so essential to his destiny, so decisive with regard to his eternal misery or happiness, were nevertheless become problems, every where destined merely to amuse the leisure of the schools and the vanity of the Sophists; idle questions, in which they were never interested for the principle of truth, but solely for the glory of coming off conqueror. Great God! It is in this manner that thou sportest with human wisdom.

and

If from thence we entered into the Christian ages, who could enumerate that endless variety of sects which, in all times, hath broken the unity, in order to follow strange doctrines? What were the abominations of the Gnosticks, the extravagant follies of the Valentinians, the fanaticism of Montanus, the contradictions of the Manicheans? Follow every age; as, in order to prove the just, it is necessary that there be heresies, You will find that in every age the church hath always been miserably rent with them.

Recall to your remembrance the sad dissensions of only the past age. Since the separation of our brethren, what a monstrous variety in their doctrine! What endless sects sprung from only one sect! What numberless particular assemblies in one same schism! O faith! O gift of God! O divine torch, which comes to clear up darkness, how necessary art thou to man! O infallible rule, sent from heaven, and given in trust to the church of Jesus Christ, always the same in all ages, always independant of places, of times, of nations, and of interests, how requisite it is that thou served as a check upon the eternal fluctuations of the human mind! O pillar of fire, at same time so obscure and so luminous, of what importance it is that thou always conducted the camp of the Lord, the tabernacle and the tents of Israel, through all the perils of the desert, the rocks, the temptations, and the dark and unknown paths of this life !

so

For you, my brethren, what instruction should we draw from this discourse, and what should I say to you in concluding ? You say that you have faith ; shew your faith by your works. What shall it avail you to have believed, if your manners have belied your belief ? The gospel is yet more the religion of the heart than of the mind. That faith which makes Christians is not a simple submission of the reason ; it is a pious tenderness of the soul ; it is a continual longing to become like unto Jesus Christ ; it is an indefatigable application in rooting out from ourselves whatever may be inimical to a life of faith. There is an unbelief of the heart, equally dangerous to salvation as that of the mind. A man who obstinately refuses belief, after all the proofs of religion, is a monster, whom we contemplate with horror ; but a Christian who believes, yet lives as though he believed not, is a madman, whose folly compasseth comprehension : the one procures his own condemnation, like a man desperate ; the other, like an indolent one, who tranquilly allows himself to be carried down by the waves, and thinks that he is thereby saving himself. Make your faith then certain, my brethren, by your good works ; and if you shudder at the sole name

name of an impious person, have the same horror at yourselves, seeing we are taught by faith, that the destiny of the wicked Christian shall not be different from his, and that his lot shall be the same as that of the unbeliever. Live conformably to what you believe. Such is the faith of the righteous, and the only one to which the eternal promises have been made.

SER.

SERMON II.

DOUBTS UPON RELIGION.

JOHN vii. 27.

Howbeit we know this man, whence he is ; but when Christ cometh, no man knoweth whence he is.

SUCH is the grand pretext opposed by the unbelief of the Jews to the doctrine and to the ministry of Jesus Christ ; doubts upon the truth of his mission. We know who thou art, and whence thou comest, said they to him ; but the Christ whom we expect, when he cometh, no man knoweth whence he is. It is far from clear, then, that thou art the Messiah promised to our fathers ; perhaps it is an evil spirit which, through thee, operates these wonders before our eyes, and imposes upon the credulity of the vulgar ; so many deceivers have already appeared in Judea, who, giving themselves out for the Great Prophet who is to come, have seduced the people, and at last drawn down upon themselves the punishment due to their imposture. Keep us no longer in doubt : if thou be the Christ, tell us plainly, and in such a way as that room shall no longer be left either for doubt or for mistake.

I would not dare to say this here, my brethren, were the language of doubts upon faith not become so common now among us, that precaution is needless in undertaking to confute it : behold the almost universal pretext employed in the world to authorise a life altogether criminal. We every where meet with sinners who coolly tell us, that they would be converted were they well assured that all we tell them of religion were true ; that perhaps there is nothing after this life ; that they have doubts and difficulties upon our mysteries, to which they can find no satisfactory answer ; that, after all, the whole appears very uncertain ; and that, before engaging to follow all the rigid maxims of the gospel, it would be proper to be well assured that our toils shall not be lost.

Now, my intention at present is not to overthrow unbelief, by the grand proofs which establish the truth of the Christian faith : setting aside that elsewhere we have already established them, it is a subject far too extensive for a discourse, and often beyond even the capacity of the majority of those who listen to us ; it is frequently paying too much deference to the frivolous objections of those who give themselves out as freethinkers in the world, to employ the gravity of our ministry in refuting and overthrowing them.
who

We must take a shorter and more easy way, therefore, at present. My design is not to enter into the foundation of the proofs which render testimony to the truth of faith; I mean only to expose the falsity of unbelief: I mean to prove that the greatest part of those who call themselves unbelievers, are not so; that almost all those sinners who vaunt, and are continually alleging to us their doubts, as the only obstacle to their conversion, have actually none; and that, of all the pretexts employed as an excuse for not changing their life, that of doubts upon religion, now the most common, is the least true and the least sincere.

It appears surprising at first that I should undertake to prove to those who believe to have doubts upon religion, and are continually objecting them to us, that they have actually none: nevertheless, with a proper knowledge of men, and, above all, with a proper attention to the character of those who make a boast of doubting, nothing is more easy than this conviction. I say to their character, in which are always to be found licentiousness, ignorance, and vanity; and such are the three usual sources of their doubts: they give the credit of them to unbelief, which has scarcely a share in them.

1stly,

1stly, It is licentiousness which proposes, without daring to believe them. First reflection.

2dly, It is ignorance which adopts, without comprehending them. Second reflection.

Lastly, It is vanity which boasts, without being able to succeed in drawing any resource from them. Last reflection.

That is to say, that the greatest part of those who call themselves unbelievers, are licentious enough to wish to be so; too ignorant to be so in reality; and, nevertheless, sufficiently vain to wish to appear so. Let us unfold these three reflections, now become so important among us; and let us overthrow licentiousness rather than unbelief, by laying it open to itself.

PART I. It must at once be admitted, my brethren, and it is melancholy for us that we owe this confession to the truth: it must be admitted, I say, that our age and those of our fathers have seen real unbelievers. In that depravity of manners in which we live, and amid all the scandals which have so long afflicted the church, it is not surprising that men have sometimes been found who have denied the existence of a God; and that faith so weakened in all, should, in some, be at last wholly extinguished. As chosen and extraordinary souls appear in every age, whom the Lord filleth with his grace, his lights, and his most shining gifts, and upon whom he delighteth in liberally pouring forth all the riches of his mercy; so, likewise, are seen others in whom iniquity is, as I may say, consummate; and whom the Lord seems to have marked out, to display in them the most terrible judgments of his justice, and the most fatal effects of his neglect and wrath.
likewise,

The church, where all these scandals are to increase even to the end, cannot, therefore, boast of being entirely purged from the scandal of unbelief: she hath, from time to time, her stars which enlighten, and her monsters who disfigure her; and, along with those great men, celebrated for their lights and for their sanctity, who in every age have served as her support and ornament, she hath also witnessed a list of impious men, whose names are still at present the horror of the universe, who have dared, in writings full of blasphemy and impiety, to attack the mysteries of God, to deny salvation and the promises made to our fathers, to overturn the foundation of faith, and to preach free-thinking among believers.

I do not pretend, therefore, to say, that, among so many wretches who speak the language of unbelief among us, there may not perhaps be found some one sufficiently corrupted in mind and in heart, and so far abandoned by God, as actually and in effect to be an unbeliever: I mean only to establish, that these men grounded in impiety are rare; and that, among all those who are continually vaunting their doubts and their unbelief, and make a deplorable ostentation of them, there is not not perhaps a single one upon whose heart faith doth not still preserve its rights, and who doth not inwardly dread that God whom he apparently refuses to acknowledge. To overthrow, it is not always necessary to combat our pretended unbelievers; it would often be combating only phantoms: they require only to be displayed such as they are: the wretched decoration of unbelief quickly tumbles down, and nothing remains but their passions and their debaucheries.

And behold the first reason upon which I have established the general proposition, that the majority of those who make a boast of their doubts have actually none; it is, that their doubts are those of licentiousness, and not of unbelief. Why, my brethren? Because it is licentiousness which hath formed their doubts, and not their doubts licentiousness; because that, in fact, it is to their passions and not to their doubts that they hold; lastly, because that, in general, they attack in religion only those truths inimical to their passions. Behold reflections which in my opinion are worthy of your attention; I shall lay them before you without ornament, and in the same order in which they presented themselves to my mind.

I say, in the first place; because their doubts have sprung from licentiousness, and not licentiousness from their doubts. Yes, my brethren, not one of all those who affect to profess themselves unbelievers has ever been seen to begin by doubt:

doubts upon the truths of faith, and afterwards from doubts to fall into licentiousness : they begin with the passions ; doubts come afterwards : they first give way to the irregularities of the age, and to the excesses of debauchery ; and when attained to a certain length, and they find it no longer possible to return upon their steps, they then say, in order to quiet themselves, that there is nothing after this life, or, at least, they are well pleased to find people who say so. It is not, therefore, the little certainty they find in religion which authorises their conclusion that we ought to yield ourselves up to pleasure, and that self-denial is needless, since every thing dies with us : it is the yielding of themselves up to pleasure which creates doubts upon religion, and, by rendering self-denial next to impossible, leads them to conclude that, consequently, it is needless. Faith becomes suspected only when it begins to be troublesome ; and, to this day, unbelief hath never made a voluptuary ; but voluptuousness hath made almost all the unbelievers.

And a proof of what I say, you whom this discourse regards, is that, while you have lived with modesty and innocence, you never doubted. Recollect those happy times when the passions had not yet corrupted your heart ; the faith of your fathers had then nothing but what was august and respectable ; reason bent without pain to the yoke of authority ; you never thought of doubts or difficulties :

difficulties : from the moment your manners changed, your views upon religion have no longer been the same. It is not faith, therefore, which hath found new difficulties in your reason ; it is the practice of duties which hath encountered new obstacles in your heart. And should you tell us, that your first impressions, so favourable to faith, sprung solely from the prejudices of education and of childhood, we shall answer, that the second, so favourable to impiety, have sprung solely from the prejudices of the passions and of debauchery ; and that, prejudices for prejudices, it appears to us, that it is still better to keep by those which are formed in innocence and lead us to virtue, than to those which are born in the infamy of the passions, and preach up only free-thinking and guilt.

Thus nothing is more humiliating for unbelief than recalling it to its origin : it bears a false name of learning and of light : and it is a child of iniquity and of darkness. It is not the strength of reason which has led our pretended unbelievers to skepticism ; it is the weakness of a corrupted heart which has been unable to surmount its infamous passions ; it is even a mean cowardliness which, unable to support and to view with a steady eye the terrors and the threatenings of religion, endeavours to shake off their thoughts by continually repeating that they are childish terrors ; it is a man who, afraid of the night, sings as he goes along along to prevent himself from thinking : debauchery always makes us cowardly and fearful ; and it is nothing but an excess of fear of eternal punishments which occasions a sinner to be continually preaching up and singing to us that they are doubtful ; he trembles, and wishes to strengthen himself against himself ; he cannot support, at the same time, the view of his crimes, and that of the punishment which awaits them ; that faith, so venerable, and of which he speaks with such contempt, nevertheless terrifies and disquiets him still more than those other sinners who, without doubting its punishments, yet are frequently not less unfaithful to its precepts : it is a coward who hides his fear under a false ostentation of bravery. No, my brethren, our pretended free-thinkers give themselves out as men of courage and firmness ; examine them narrowly, and they are the weakest and most cowardly of men.

Besides, it is not surprising that licentiousness lead us to doubt of religion : the passions require the aid of unbelief ; for they are too feeble and too unreasonable to maintain their own cause. Our lights, our feelings, our conscience, all struggle within us against them : we are under the necessity, therefore, of seeking a support for them, and of defending them against ourselves : for, it is a matter of satisfaction, to justify to one's self whatever is pleasing. We would neither wish that passions which are dear to us should be criminal, nor that we should continually to have to support the interests of our pleasures against those of our conscience: we wish tranquilly to enjoy our crimes, and to free ourselves from that troublesome monitor which continually espouses the cause of virtue against ourselves: while remorse contests the pleasure of our enjoyments, they must be very imperfectly tasted: it is paying too great a price for guilt, to purchase it at the expence of that quiet which is sought in it: we must either terminate our debaucheries, or try to quiet ourselves in them; and as it is impossible to enjoy peace of mind in them, and next to impossible to terminate them, the only refuge seems that of doubting the truths which disquiet us; and, in order to attain to tranquility, every effort is used to inculcate the persuasion of unbelief.

That is to say, that the great effort of licentiousness is that of leading us to the desire of unbelief: the horrible security of the unbeliever is coveted; total hardness of heart is considered as a happy state; it is unpleasant to have been born with a weaker and more fearful conscience; the lot of those, apparently firm and unshaken in impiety, is envied; while they, in their turn, perhaps a prey to the most gloomy remorse, and vaunting a courage they are far from having, view our lot with envy; for, judging of us from the language we hold upon free-thinking, they take us for what we take them, that is to say, for what we are not,
and

and for what both they and we would wish to be. And it is thus, O my God! that these false heroes of impiety live in a perpetual illusion, continually deceive themselves, and appear what they are not, only because they would wish to be it: they would willingly have religion to be but a dream: they say in their heart "There is no God;" that is to say, this impious language is the desire of their heart: they would ardently wish no God; that that Being, so grand and so necessary, were a chimaera; that they were the sole masters of their own destiny; that they were accountable only to themselves for the horrors of their life and the infamy of their passions; that all finished with them; and that, beyond the grave, there were no supreme and eternal Judge, the punisher of vice and the rewarder of virtue: they wish it; they destroy as much as they can through the impious wishes of their heart, but they cannot efface, from the foundation of their being, the idea of his power and the dread of his punishments.

In effect, it would be too vulgar for a man, vain and plunged in debauchery, inwardly to say to himself: I am still too weak, and too much abandoned to pleasure, to quit it, or to lead a more regular and Christian life. That pretext would still leave all his remorse: it is much sooner done to say to himself, It is needless to live otherwise, for there is nothing after this life. This pretext is far more convenient, for it puts an end to every thing; it is the most favourable to indolence, for it estranges us from the sacraments, and from all the other flaveries of religion. It is much shorter to say to himself, "There is nothing," and to live as if he were in effect persuaded of it; it is at once throwing off every yoke and all restraint; it puts an end to all the irksome measures which finners of another description still guard with religion and with the conscience. This pretext of unbelief, by persuading us that we actually doubt, leaves us in a certain state of indolence on every thing regarding religion, which prevents us from searching into ourselves, and from making too melancholy reflections on our passions: we meanly allow ourselves to be swept away by the fatal course, upon the general prepossession that we believe nothing; we have few remorse, for we think ourselves unbelievers, and because that supposition leaves us almost the same security as impiety: at least, it is a diversion which dulls and suspends the sensibility of the conscience; and, by operating so as to make us always take ourselves for what we are not, it induces us to live as if we actually were what we wish to be.

That is to say, that the greatest part of these pretended free-thinkers, and of these debauched and licentious unbelievers, ought to be considered as weak and dissolute men, who, not having the force to live christianly, nor even the hardness to be atheists, remain in that state of estrangement from religion, religion, as the most convenient to indolence; and, as they never try to quit it, they fancy that they actually hold to it: it is a kind of neutrality betwixt faith and irreligion, contrived by indolence for its own ease; for it requires exertion to adopt a party; and, in order to remain neuter, nothing more is required than not to think, and to live by habit; thus they never fathom, nor take any resolution upon themselves. Hardened and avowed impiety hath something, I know not what, which strikes with horror: religion, on the other hand, presents objects which alarm, and are by no means convenient to the passions. What is to be done in these two extremities, of which the one shocks reason, and the other senses? They rest wavering and undecided; in the mean time they enjoy the calm which is left by that state of indecision and indifference: they live without wishing to know what they are; for it is much more convenient to be nothing, and to live without thinking, or any knowledge of themselves. No, my brethren, I repeat it; these are not unbelievers, they are cowards, who have not the courage to espouse a party; who know only to live voluptuously, without rule, without morality, and often without decency; and who, without being atheists, live however without religion, for religion requires consistency, reason, elevation of mind, firmness, noble sentiments, and of all these they are incapable. Such, however, are the heroes of whom impiety boasts; behold the suffrages fuffrages upon which it grounds its defence, and opposes to religion, by insulting us; behold the partisans with whom it thinks itself invincible; and weak and wretched must its resources indeed be, since it is reduced to seek them in men of this description.

First reason which proves that licentiousness springs not from doubts, but doubts from licentiousness. The second reason is only a fresh proof of the first; it is that actually, if they do not change their life, it is not to their doubts, but solely to their passions that they hold.

For I ask nothing of you here but candour, you who continually allege your doubts upon our mysteries. When you sometimes think of quitting that sink of vice and debauchery in which you live, and when the passions, more tranquil, allow you to reflect, do you then oppose your uncertainties upon religion? Do you say to yourselves, “ But “ if I return it will be necessary to believe things “ which seem incredible?” Is this the grand difficulty? Ah! you inwardly say, but if I return it will be necessary to break off this connection, to deny myself these excesses, to terminate these societies, to shun these places, to proceed to things which I shall never support, and to adopt a manner of life to which all my inclinations are repugnant. These are what check you; these are the wall of separation which removes you from God. You speak so much to others of your doubts; how comes comes it that you never speak of them to yourselves? This is not a matter, therefore, of reason and of belief; it is a matter of the heart and of licentiousness; and the delay of your conversion springs not from your uncertainties upon faith, but from the sole doubt in which the violence and the empire of your passions leave you of ever being able to free yourselves from their subjection and infamy. Such, my brethren, are the true chains which bind our pretended unbelievers to their own wretchedness.

And this truth is more evident from this, that the majority of those who profess themselves unbelievers, live, nevertheless, in perpetual variations upon the point even of unbelief. In certain moments they are affected with the truths of religion: they feel themselves torn with the keenest remorse; they even apply to the servants of God most distinguished for their learning and piety, to hold converse with, and receive instructions from them: in others, they make game of these truths; they treat the servants of God with derision, and piety itself as a chimera: there is scarcely one of these sinners, even of those who make the greatest ostentation of their unbelief, whom the spectacle of an unexpected death, a fatal accident, a grievous loss, or a reverse of fortune hath not cast into gloomy reflections on his situation, and excited desires of a more Christian life; there is hardly one who, in these trying situations, seeks not consolation in the support;

support of the godly, and take not some step which leaves hopes of amendment. It is not to their companions in impiety and licentiousness that they then have recourse for consolation; it is not by those impious railleries upon our mysteries, and by that horrible philosophy that they try to alleviate their sufferings: these are discourses of festivity and dissipation, and not of affliction and sorrow: it is the religion of the table, of pleasures, of riotings; it is not that of solemn adversity and sadness: the relish of impiety vanishes with that of pleasures. Now, if their unbelief were founded in real uncertainties upon religion, so long as these uncertainties existed, unbelief should be the same; but as their doubts spring only from their passions, and as their passions are not always the same, nor equally violent and masters of their heart, so their doubts continually fluctuate like their passions; they increase, they diminish, they are eclipsed, they reappear, they are mutable, exactly in the same degree as their passions; in a word, they share the lot of the passions, for they are nothing but the passions themselves.

In effect, to leave nothing unsaid on this subject, and to make you thoroughly feel how much this vaunted profession of unbelief is despicable, observe that, reply to every difficulty of the boasting sinner, reduce him to have nothing more to say, and yet still he does not yield; you have not thereby gained him ; he retires within himself, as if he had still more overpowering reasons which he disdains to bring forward : he keeps firm, and opposes a mysterious and decisive air to all those proofs which he cannot resolve. You then pity his madness and obstinacy : you are mistaken ; be touched only for his libertine life, and his want of candour ; for, let a mortal disease strike him on quitting you ; approach his bed of anguish, ah ! you will find this pretended unbeliever convinced ; his doubts cease, his uncertainties end, all that deplorable display of unbelief vanishes and tumbles in pieces ; there is no longer even question of it ; he has recourse to the God of his fathers, and trembles at the judgments he made a shew of not believing. The minister of Jesus Christ, called in, has no occasion to enter into controversy to undeceive him on his impiety : the dying sinner anticipates his cares and his ministry : he is ashamed of his past blasphemies, and repents of them ; he acknowledges their falsity and deception ; he makes a public reparation of them to the majesty and to the truth of religion ; he no longer demands proofs, he asks only consolations. Nevertheless, this disease hath not brought new lights upon faith ; the blow which strikes his flesh has not cleared up the doubts of his mind ; ah ! it is because it touches his heart, and terminates his riots ; in a word, it is that his doubts were in his passions, and that whatever tends to extinguish his passions, tends, at the same time, to extinguish his doubts.
by

It happens, I confess, that sinners are sometimes found, who push their madness and impiety even to that last moment : who expire in vomiting forth with their impious soul, blasphemies against the God who is to judge them, and whom they refuse to acknowledge. For, O my God ! thou art terrible in thy judgments, and sometimes permittest that the atheist die in his impiety. But such examples are rare ; and you well know, my brethren, that an entire age scarcely furnishes one of these shocking spectacles. But view, in that last moment, all the others who vaunted their unbelief ; see a sinner on the bed of death, who had hitherto appeared the firmest in impiety, and the most resolute in denying all belief ; he even anticipates the proposal of having recourse to the church remedies : he lifts up his hands to heaven, and gives striking and sincere marks of a religion which was never effaced from the bottom of his heart ; he no longer rejects, as childish bugbears, the threatenings and chastisements of a future life ; what do I say ? this sinner, formerly so firm, so stately in his pretended unbelief, so much above the vulgar fears, then becomes weaker, more fearful, and more credulous than the lowest of the people ; his fears are more excessive, his very religion more superstitious, his practices of worship more silly, and more extravagant than those of the vulgar ;

vulgar ; and as one excess borders on its opposite excess, he is seen to pass in a moment from impiety to superstition ; from the firmness of the philosopher, to all the weakness of the ignorant and simple.

And here it is that, with Tertullian, I would appeal to this dying sinner, and let him hold forth, in my stead, against unbelief ; it is here that, to the honour of the religion of our fathers, I would wish no other testimony of the weakness and of the insincerity of the pretended atheist, than this expiring soul, who, surely now, can speak only the language of truth ; it is here that I would assemble all unbelievers around his bed of death ; and, to overthrow them by a testimony which could not be suspicious, would say to him, with Tertullian : “ O soul ! before thou quittest this “ earthly body, which thou art so soon to be freed
“ from, suffer me to call upon thy testimony :
“ speak, in this last moment, when vanity is no “ more, and thou owest all to the truth ; say, if “ thou considerest the terrible God, into whose “ hands thou goest, as a chimerical being with “ whom weak and credulous minds are alarmed ?
“ Say, if, all now disappearing from thine eyes,
“ if, for thee, all creatures returning to nothing,
“ God alone doth not appear to thee immortal, “ unchangeable, the being of all ages and of eter“ nity, and who filleth the heavens and the earth ?
“ We now consent, we, whom thou hast always “ considered

“ considered as superstitious and vulgar minds,
 “ we consent that thou judge betwixt us and un“ belief, to which thou hast ever been so partial.
 “ Though, with regard to faith, thou hast hither“ to been as a stranger and the enemy of religion, “ religion refers its cause to thee, against those “ with whom the shocking tie of impiety had so “ closely united thee. If all die with thee, why “ does death appear so dreadful? Why these up“ lifted hands to heaven, if there be no God who “ may listen to thy prayers, and be touched by “ thy groanings? If nothing thyself, why belie
 “ the nothingness of thy being, and why tremble
 “ upon the sequel of thy destiny? Whence come,
 “ in this last moment, these feelings of dread and “ of respect for the supreme Being? Is it not, that “ they have ever been in thee, that thou hast im“ posed upon the public by a false ostentation of “ impiety, and that death only unfolds those dis“ positions of faith and of religion, which, though “ dormant, have never ceased during life.”

Yes, my brethren, could the passions be destroyed, all unbelievers would soon be recalled; and a final reason, which fully proves it, is that, if they seem to rise up against the incomprehensibility of our mysteries, it is solely for the purpose of combating what touches them, and of attacking the truths which interest the passions; that is to say, the truth of a future state, and the eternity of future

ture punishments; this is always the favourite conclusion and fruit of their doubts.

In effect, if religion, without adding maxims and truths which restrain the passions, proposed only mysteries which exceed reason, we may boldly say, that unbelievers would be rare; almost no one is interested in those abstruse truths or errors, which it is indifferent to believe or to deny. You will find few real votaries of truth who become partisans and zealots in support of merely speculative and unimportant points, because they believe them to be true. The abstruse truths of mathematics have found, in our days, some zealous and estimable followers who have devoted themselves to the elucidation of what is held as most impene- trable in the infinite secrets and profound obscurities of that science; but these are rare and singular men: the infection was little to be dreaded, nor, in truth, has it spread; they are admired, but few would wish to follow their example. If religion proposed only truths equally abstruse, equally indifferent to the felicity of the senses, equally uninteresting to the passions and to self-love, the atheists would be still more rare than the mathematicians. The truths of religion are objected to, merely because they threaten us: no objections are made to the others, because their truth or their falsity is alike indifferent.

And tell us not that it is not through self-interest, but the sole love of truth, that the unbeliever rejects

rejects mysteries which reason rejects. This, I well know, is the boast of the pretended unbeliever, and he would wish us to think so; but of what consequence is the truth to men, who, so far from either seeking, loving, or knowing it, wish even to conceal it from themselves? What matters to them a truth beyond their reach, and to which they have never devoted a single serious moment; which, having nothing flattering to the passions, can never be interesting to these men of flesh and blood, plunged in a voluptuous life? Their object is to gratify their irregular desires, and yet have nothing to dread after this life; this is the only truth which interests them: give up that point, and the obscurity of all the other mysteries will not occupy even a thought; let them but tranquilly enjoy their crimes, and they will agree to every thing.

Thus the majority of atheists, who have left in writing the wretched fruits of their impiety, have always strove to prove that there was nothing above us; that all died with the body, and that future punishments or rewards were fables; to attract followers it was necessary to secure the suffrage of the passions. If ever they attacked the other points of religion, it was only to come to the main conclusion, that there is nothing after this life; that vices or virtues are names invented by policy to restrain the people; and that the passions are only natural and innocent inclinations, which every one may

may follow, because every one finds them in himself.

Behold why the impious, in the book of Wisdom, the Sadducees themselves, in the gospel, who may be considered as the fathers and predecessors of our unbelievers, never took any pains to refute the truth of the miracles related in the books of Moses, and which God formerly wrought in favour of his people, nor the promise of the Mediator made to their fathers: they attacked only the resurrection of the dead, and the immortality of the soul: that point decided every thing for them. “Man dies like the beast,” said they in the book of Wisdom; “we know not if their nature be different, but their end and their lot are the same: trouble us no more, therefore, with a futurity which is not; let us enjoy life; let us refuse ourselves no gratification: time is short; let us hasten to live, for we shall die to-morrow, and because all shall die with us.” No, my brethren, unbelief hath always originated in the passions: the yoke of faith is never rejected but in order to shake off the yoke of duties; and religion would never have an enemy, were it not the enemy of licentiousness and vice.

But if the doubts of our unbelievers are not real, in consequence of being formed solely by licentiousness, they are also false, because it is ignorance which adopts without comprehending them, and vanity which makes a boast without being able to make a resource of them: this is what now remains to me to unfold.
make

PART II. The same answer might be made to the majority of those who are continually vaunting their doubts upon religion, and find nothing but contradictions in what faith obliges us to believe, that Tertullian formerly made to the heathens upon all the reproaches they invented against the mysteries and the doctrine of Jesus Christ. They condemn, said he, what they do not understand; they blame what they have never examined, and what they know only by hearsay; they blaspheme what they are ignorant of, and they are ignorant of it, because they hate it too much to give themselves the trouble of searching into and knowing it. Now, continues this father, nothing is more indecent and foolish than boldly to decide upon what they know not; and all that religion would require of these frivolous and dissolute men, who so warmly rise up against it, is not to condemn before they are well acquainted with it.

Such, my brethren, is the situation of almost all who give themselves out in the world as unbelievers; they have investigated neither the difficulties nor the respectable proofs of religion; they know not even enough to doubt of them. They hate it; for how is it possible to love our condemnation? and upon that hatred are founded their doubts and their only arguments to oppose it.

In effect, when I glance my eye over all that the Christian ages have had of great men, elevated geniuses, profound and enlightened scholars, who, after an entire life of study and indefatigable application, have, with an humble docility, submitted to the mysteries of faith; have found the proofs of religion so strong, that the proudest and most untractable reason might, in their opinion, without derogation, comply; have defended it against the blasphemies of the pagans; have silenced the vain philosophy of the sages of the age, and made the folly of the cross to triumph over all the wisdom and erudition of Rome and Athens; it strikes me, that, in order to renew the attack against mysteries so long and so universally established; that, in order to be heard in appeal, if I may venture to say so, from the submission of so many ages, from the writings of so many great men, from so many victories achieved by faith, from the consent of the universe; in a word, from a prescription so long and so well strengthened, it would require either new proofs that had never yet been controverted, or new difficulties that had never yet been started, or new methods which discovered a weak side in religion as yet never found out. It seems to me, that, singly to rise up against so many testimonies, so many prodigies, so many ages, so many divine monuments, so many famous personages, so many works which time hath consecrated, and which, like pure gold, have quitted the ordeal of unbelief only more resplendid and immortal ; in a word, so many surprising, and till then unheard of, events, which establish the faith of Christians, it would require very decisive and very evident reasons, very rare and new lights, to pretend even to doubt, much less to oppose it. Would not that man be deservedly considered as out of his senses, who should go to defy an whole army, merely to make an ostentation of a vain defiance, and to pride himself upon a burlesque bravery ?

Nevertheless, when you examine the majority of those who call themselves unbelievers, who are continually clamouring against the popular prejudices, who vaunt their doubts, and defy us to satisfy or to answer them ; you find that their only knowledge consists of some hackneyed and vulgar doubts, which, in all times, have been, and still continue to be, argued in the world ; that they know nothing but a certain jargon of licentiousness which goes from hand to hand, which they receive without examination and repeat without understanding : you find that their whole skill and study of religion are reduced to some licentious sayings, which, if I may descend so low, are the proper language of the streets ; to certain maxims which, through mere repetition, begin to relish of proverbial meanness. You will find no foundation, no principle, no sequence of doctrine, no knowledge even of the religion which they attack : they are men immersed in pleasure, and who would be very sorry to have a spare moment to devote to the investigation of wearisome truths which they are indifferent whether they know or not ; men of a light and superficial character, and wholly unfitted for a moment's serious meditation or investigation ; let me again repeat, men drowned in voluptuousness, and in whom even that portion of penetration and understanding, accorded by nature, hath been debased and extinguished by debauchery.
who

Such are the formidable supports of unbelief against the knowledge of God : behold the frivolous, dissipated, and ignorant characters who dare to tax, with credulity and ignorance, all that the Christian ages have had, and still have of learned, able, and celebrated personages : they know the language of doubts ; but they have learned it by rote, for they never formed them ; they only repeat what they have heard : it is a tradition of ignorance and impiety : they have no doubts : they only preserve, for those to come, the language of irreligion and doubts ; they are not unbelievers, they are only the echoes of unbelief ; in a word, they know how to express a doubt, but they are too ignorant to doubt themselves.

And a proof of what I advance is, that, in all other doubts, we hesitate only in order to be instructed ; every thing is examined which can elucidate the concealed truth. But here the doubt is merely for doubting's sake ; a proof that we are equally

equally uninterested in the doubt, as in the truth which it conceals from us; they would be very sorry were they under the necessity of clearing up either the falsity, or the truth of the uncertainties which they pretend to have upon our mysteries. Yes, my brethren, were the punishment of doubters to be that of an indispensable obligation to seek the truth, no one would doubt; no one would purchase, at such a price, the pleasure of calling himself an unbeliever; few indeed would be capable of it: decisive proof that they do not doubt, and that they are as little attached to their doubts as to religion (for their knowledge in both is much about the same); but only that they have lost those first feelings of discretion and of faith which left us still some vestige of respect for the religion of our fathers. Thus, it is doing too much honour to men, so worthy both of pity and contempt, to suppose that they have taken a side, that they have embraced a system; you honour them too much by ranking them among the impious followers of a Socinus, by ennobling them with the shocking titles of deists or atheists: alas! they are nothing; they are of no system; at least, they neither know themselves what they are, nor can they tell us what that system is; and, strange as it may appear, they have found out the secret of forming a state more despicable, more mean, and more unworthy of reason, than even that of impiety; and it is even doing them credit to call them

them by the shocking title of unbeliever, which had hitherto been considered as the shame of humanity, and the highest reproach of man.

And, to conclude this article with a reflection which confirms the same truth, and is very humiliating for our pretended unbelievers, I observe that they, who affect to treat us as weak and credulous minds, who vaunt their reason, who accuse us of grounding a religion upon the popular prejudices, and of believing, solely because our predecessors have believed; they, I say, are unbelievers, and doubt upon the sole and deplorable authority of a debauchee, whom they have often heard to say, that futurity is a bug-bear, and made use of as a scarecrow to frighten only children and the common people: such is their only knowlege, and their only use of reason. They are impious, as they accuse us of being believers without examination, and through credulousness; but through a credulity which can find no excuse but in madness and folly; the authority of a single impious discourse, pronounced in a bold and decisive tone, hath subjugated their reason, and ranked them in the lists of impiety. They call us credulous, in yielding to the authority of the prophets, of the apostles, of men inspired by God, of the shining miracles wrought to establish the truth of our mysteries, and to that venerable tradition of holy pastors, who, from age to age, have transmitted to us the charge of doctrine and of truth; that is to say, to the greatest authority that hath ever been on the earth; and they think themselves less credulous, and it appears to them more worthy of reason, to submit to the authority of a free-thinker, who, in a moment of debauchery, pronounces, with a firm tone, that there is no God, yet, most likely, inwardly belies his own words. Ah! my brethren, how much does man degrade and render himself contemptible when he arrogates a false glory from being no longer in the belief of a God!

Thus, why is it, think you, that our pretended unbelievers are so desirous of seeing real atheists confirmed in impiety; that they seek and entice them even from foreign countries, like a Spinoza, if the fact be, that he was called into France to be heard and consulted? It is because our unbelievers are not firm in unbelief, nor can they find any who are so; and, in order to harden themselves, they would gladly see some one actually confirmed in that detestable cause: they seek, in precedent, resources and defences against their own conscience; and, not daring of themselves to become impious, they expect from an example what their reason and even their heart refuses; and, in so doing, they surely fall into a credulity much more childish and absurd than that with which they reproach believers. A Spinoza, that monster, who, after embracing various religions, ended with none, was not anxious to find out some professed free-thinker thinker who might confirm him in the cause of irreligion and atheism: he formed to himself that impenetrable chaos of impiety, that work of confusion and darkness in which the sole desire of not believing in God can support the weariness and disgust of those who read it: in which, excepting the impiety, all is unintelligible; and which would, from its birth, have sunk into oblivion, had it not, to the shame of humanity, attacked the supreme Being: that impious wretch, I say, lived concealed, retired, tranquil: his dark productions were his only occupation, and, to harden himself, he needed only himself. But those who so eagerly sought him, who longed to see and consult him, those frivolous and dissolute men were fools who wished to become impious; and who, not finding sufficient authority to remain believers in the testimony of all ages, of all nations, and of all the great men who have honoured religion, sought, in the single testimony of an obscure individual, of a deserter from every religion, of a monster obliged to hide himself from the eyes of men, a deplorable and monstrous authority which might confirm them in impiety, and defend them from their own conscience. Great God! let the impious here hide their faces; let them cease to make an ostentation of an unbelief which is the fruit of their depravity and ignorance, and no longer speak, but with blushes, of the submission of believers: it is all a language of deceit; they give to vanity what we give to truth.

I say

I say vanity ; and this is the grand and final reason which more clearly exposes all the falsity and weakness of unbelief. Yes, my brethren, all our pretended unbelievers are bullies, who give themselves out for what they are not ; they consider unbelief as conveying the idea of something above the common ; they are continually boasting that they believe nothing, and, by dint of boasting, they at last persuade themselves of it : like certain mushroom characters among us, who, though touching the obscurity and vulgarity of their ancestors, have the deplorable vanity of wishing to be thought of an illustrious birth, and descended from the greatest names ; by dint of blazoning and repeating it, they attain almost to the belief of it themselves. It is the same with our pretended unbelievers ; they still touch, as I may say, that faith which they have received at their birth, which still flows with their blood, and is not yet effaced from their heart ; but they think it a vulgarity and meanness, at which they blush ; by dint of saying and boasting that they believe nothing, they are convinced that they really do not believe, and have consequently a much higher opinion of themselves.

1stly, Because that deplorable profession of unbelief supposes an uncommon understanding, strength and superiority of mind, and a singularity which is pleasing and flattering ; on the contrary, that the passions infer only licentiousness and debauchery, of which all men are capable, though they are not fo of that wonderful superiority attributed to itself by impiety.

2dly, Because faith is fo weakened in our age, that we find few in the world, who pique themselves upon wit and a little more knowledge or erudition than others, who do not allow themselves doubts and difficulties upon the most august and most sacred parts of religion. It would be a disgrace, therefore, in their company to appear religious and believers: they are men high in the public esteem, and any resemblance to them is flattering; in adopting their language, their talents and reputation are thought likewise to be adopted; and not to dare to follow or to copy them would, it seems, be making a public avowal of weakness and mediocrity: miserable and childish vanity! Besides, because they have heard say that certain characters distinguished in their age did not believe; and as the memory of their talents and great actions has been preserved only with that of their irreligion, they vaunt these grand examples: after such illustrious models, it appears dignified to believe nothing; their names are constantly in their mouths: it is a false embroidery, where a laughable vanity and littleness of mind alone are conspicuous, since nothing can be more miserable or mean than to give ourselves out for what we are not, or to assume the personage of another.

3dly, and lastly, Because the language of impiety is, in general, the consequence of licentious so-

ty : we wish to appear the same as our companions in debauchery ; for it would be a shame to be dissolute, and yet seem to believe, in the very presence of our accomplices in riot. It is a sorry cause that of a debauchee who still believes ; impiety and licentiousness are the only colour for debauchery ; without these he would be only a novice in profligacy : the dread of punishments and of an hell is left to those yet unexercised in guilt ; that remain of religion seems to favour still too much of childhood and the college. But when attained to a certain length in debauchery, ah ! these vulgar weaknesses must all be soared above ; their opinion of themselves is raised in proportion as they can persuade others that they are now above all these fears ; they even mock those who appear still to dread : like the wife of Job, they say, with a tone of irony and impiety, “ Dost thou still retain thine “ integrity ? Art thou so simple as to believe all “ these tales with which thy childhood hath been “ alarmed ? Thou seeest not that all these are mere“ ly the visions of weak minds, and that the more “ knowing, who preach them up so much, believe “ not a word of them themselves ? ”

O my God ! How mean and despicable is the impious man, who seems so proudly to contemn thee ? He is a coward, who outwardly insults, yet inwardly fears thee ; he is a vain boaster, who makes a shew of unbelief, but tells not what passes within ; he is an impostor, who, wishing to deceive

ceive us, cannot succeed in deceiving himself; he is a fool, who, without a single inducement, adopts all the horrors of impiety; he is a madman, who, unable to attain irreligion, or to extinguish the terrors of his conscience, extinguishes in himself all modesty and decency, and endeavours to make an impious merit of it in the eyes of men; who madly sacrifices, to the deplorable vanity of being thought an unbeliever, his religion which he still preserves, his God whom he dreads, his conscience which he feels, his eternal salvation which he hopes. What a desertion of God, and what a sink of madness and folly!

And could you, my brethren, (and in this wish I comprise the whole fruit of this discourse) who still feel a reverence for the religion of our fathers, but be sensible of the contemptability of those men who give themselves out as free-thinkers, and whom you often so much esteem; you would then comprehend how much the profession of unbelief, now so fashionable among us, is, of all other characters, the most frivolous, cowardly, and worthy of laughter; you would then know that every thing mean and shameful, even according to the world, is concealed under this ostentation of impiety, which the corruption of our manners hath now rendered so common even to both sexes.

1stly, Of licentiousness. They reach the avowal of impiety only when the heart is profoundly corrupted;

corrupted ; when they actually live in private in the most shameful debauchery ; and, were they known for what they are, they would for ever be dishonoured even in the eyes of men.

2dly, Of meanness. They act the philosopher and the wit, while, in secret, they are the most sneaking, the most dissolute, the most abandoned, and weakest of sinners, the veriest slaves of every passion unworthy of modesty, and even of reason.

3dly, Of deceit and imposition. They act a borrowed character ; they give themselves out for what they are not ; and, while so loudly exclaiming against the godly, and treating them as impostors and hypocrites, they are themselves the very cheat they decry, and the hypocrite of impiety and free-thinking.

4thly, Of ostentation and wretched vanity. They act the hero, while inwardly trembling ; for, on the first signal of death, they betray more cowardice than even the commonest of the people : they make a shew of openly insulting that God whom they still inwardly dread, and even hope to render favourable one day to themselves : a character of childishness and buffoonery, which the world itself hath always considered as the lowest, the vilest, and the most risible of all characters.

5thly, Of temerity. Without erudition or knowledge, they dare to set up as deciders upon what they are totally ignorant ; to condemn the greatest characters of every age ; and to decide upon important

important points to which they have never given, and, indeed, to which they are incapable of giving, a single moment of serious attention : an indecency of character which can accord only with men who have nothing more to lose on the side of honour.

6thly, Of folly. They pride themselves in appearing without religion ; that is to say, without character, morals, probity, fear of God and of man, and capable of every thing excepting virtue and innocence.

7thly, Of superstition. We have seen these pretended free-thinkers, who refuse to consult the oracles of the holy prophets, consulting conjurors ; admitting in men that knowledge of futurity which they refuse to God ; giving into every childish credulity, while rising up against the majesty of faith ; expecting their aggrandisement and fortune from a deceitful oracle, and unwilling to hope their salvation from the oracles of our holy books ; and, in a word, ridiculously believing in demons, while they make a boast of disbelieving a God.

Lastly, What, in my opinion, is most deplorable in these characters is, that they are in a situation which precludes almost every hope of salvation. For an actual unbeliever, if such there be, may, in a moment, be stricken of God, and overwhelmed, as it were, under the weight of that glory and majesty which he unknowingly had blasphemed : the eyes of this unfortunate wretch may still be opened

opened by the Lord in his mercy ; he may make his light to shine through his darknefs, and reveal that truth which he refifts only becaufe he knows it not : he has ftill refources, fuch as perhaps rectitude, confiftency, principles, (of error and illufion I confefs, but ftill they are principles) : he will be equally warm for his God when known, as he was his enemy when unknown. But the unbelievers, of whom I fpeak, have fcarcely a way left of returning to God ; they infult the Lord whom they know ; they blaſpheme that religion which they ftill preferve in their heart ; they refift the impreffions of confcience which ftill inwardly espoufes the caufe of faith againft themfelves ; in vain does the light of God fhine upon their heart, it ferves only to render more inexcufable the treachery of their impiety. Were they, faith Jefus Chrift, abfolutely blind, they would be worthy of pity, and their fin would be lefs : but at prefent they fee ; and confequently the guilt of their irreligion is blaſphemy againft the Holy Ghoft, which dwelleth for ever upon their head.

Let us repair then, my brethren, by our refpect for the religion of our fathers ; by a continual gratitude towards the Lord, who hath permitted us to be born in the way of falvation, into which fo many nations have not as yet been deemed worthy to enter : let us repair, I fay, the fcandal of unbelief fo common in this age, fo countenanced among us, and which, become more bold through the number and quality of its partisans, no longer hides its head, but openly shews itself, and braves, as it were, the religion of the prince, and the zeal of the pastors. Let us have in horror those impious and despicable men, who pride themselves in turning into ridicule the majesty of the religion they profess : let us fly them as monsters unworthy to live, not only among believers, but even among those connected together by honour, probity, and reason ; far from applauding their impious discourses, let us cover them with shame by that contempt which they merit. It is so low and so mean, even according to the world, to dishonour that religion in which one lives ; it is so beautiful, and there is so much real dignity in making a pride of respecting and of defending it, even with an air of authority and of indignation, against the silly speeches which attack it. By despising unbelief, let us deprive it of the deplorable glory it seeks : from the moment they are despised unbelievers will be rare among us ; and the same vanity which forms their doubts will soon annihilate or conceal them, when it shall be a disgrace among us to appear impious, and a glory to be a believer. It is thus that this scandal shall be done away, and that altogether we shall glorify the Lord in the same faith, and in the expectation of the eternal promises. Amen,
the

SERMON III.

EVIDENCE OF THE LAW OF GOD.

JOHN viii. 46.

And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me?

JESUS Christ had hitherto confuted the incredulity of the Jews by his works and his miracles; at present, he recalls them to the judgment of their own conscience and to the evidence of the truth, which, in spite of themselves, rendered testimony to his doctrine and to his ministry. Nevertheless, as they shut their eyes against the evidence of his miracles, in accusing him of operating them through the ministry of devils, so they likewise harden themselves against the evidence of his doctrine and of his mission, so clearly foretold in the scriptures, by alleging pretended obscurities, which rendered them, in their eyes, still doubtful and suspicious.

For,

For, my brethren, however evident may be the truth, that is to say, the law of God, whether in our heart, where it is written in shining and inefaceable characters, or in the rules which Jesus Christ hath left to us; we would always, either that our conscience see nothing in it but what our passions see, or that these rules be not so explicit but what we may always be able to find out some favourable interpretation and mollification of them.

In effect, two pretexts are commonly opposed by the sinners of the world against the evidence of truths, the most terrible of the law of God. 1stly, In order to calm themselves on a thousand abuses, authorised by the world, they tell us that they believe themselves to be in safety in that state; that their conscience reproaches them with nothing on that head; and that, could they be persuaded that they were in the path of error, they would instantly quit it. First pretext which is opposed to the evidence of the law of God: candour and tranquility of conscience.

2dly, They oppose that the gospel is not so clear and so explicit on certain points as we maintain it to be; that each interprets it in his own way, and makes it to say whatever he wishes; that what appears so positive to us, appears not so to all the world. Second pretext: the obscurity and uncertainty of the rules.

Now, I say that the law of God hath a two-fold mark of evidence, which shall overthrow these two pretexts, and shall condemn, at the day of judgment, all the vain excuses of sinners.

1^{stly}, It is evident in the conscience of the sinner: first reflection. 2^{dly}, It is evident in the simplicity of the rules: second reflection. The evidence of the law of God in the conscience of men: first character of the law of God, which shall judge the false security and the pretended candour of worldly souls. The evidence of the law of God in the simplicity of its rules: second character of the law of God, which shall judge the affected uncertainties, and the false interpretations of sinners. And thus it is, O my God! that thy holy law shall judge the world, and that the criminal conscience shall one day be confounded before thy tribunal, both by the lights of his own conscience, and by the perspicuity of thy heavenly maxims.

PART I. It is rather surprizing that the greatest part of worldly souls, in justification of the abuses of the world and the danger of its maxims, allege to us the candour and the tranquility of their conscience. Besides, that peace and security, in the false paths of iniquity, are rather their punishment than their excuse; and that, were it even true that the conscience should reproach them with nothing in manners regulated solely according to the false judgments of the world, that state would still be only so much the worse, and more hopeless of salvation: it appears that, of all tribunals, that of conscience is the last to which an unbelieving sou
should

should appeal; and that nothing is less favourable to the errors of a sinner than the sinner himself.

I know that there are hardened souls, to whom no ray of grace or of light can carry conviction; who live without remorse and without anxiety in the horrors of an infamous licentiousness; in whom all conscience seems extinguished, and who carry the excess of their blindness, says St Augustin, so far, as even to glory in their very blindness. But these are only rare and dreadful examples of God's justice upon men; and if such have appeared upon the earth, they only prove how far his neglect and the power of his wrath may sometimes go.

Yes, my brethren, whether we affect boldly and openly to cast off the authority of the law, like the impious and the licentious; whether we endeavour to mollify and artificially to reconcile it with our passions, by favourable interpretations, like the greatest part of worldly souls and common sinners; our conscience renders a two-fold testimony within us to this divine law: a testimony of truth to the equity and to the necessity of its maxims, and a testimony of severity to the exactitude of its rules.

I say, in the first place, a testimony of truth to the equity of its maxims. For, my brethren, God is too wise not to love order; and he is, at the same time, too good not to wish our welfare. His law must consequently bear these two characters; a character of equity, and a character of goodness: a character of equity, which regulates all the duties; ties ; a character of goodness, which makes us to find our peace and our happiness here below, in duty and in regularity.

Thus we feel, in the bottom of our hearts, that these rules are just and reasonable ; that the law of God commands nothing but what is consistent with the real interests of man ; that nothing is more consonant to the reasonable creature than gentleness, humanity, temperance, modesty, and all the virtues recommended in the gospel ; that the passions prohibited by the law are the sole source of all our troubles ; that the more we deviate from the precept, and from the law, the more do we remove ourselves from peace and tranquility of heart ; and that the Lord, in forbidding us to yield ourselves up to impetuous and iniquitous passions, hath only forbidden us to yield ourselves up to our own tyrants, and that his only intention hath been to render us happy in rendering us believers.

Behold a testimony which the law of God finds in the bottom of our hearts. Hurried away by the delusion of the senses, we vainly cast off the yoke of the holy rules ; we can never succeed in justifying, even to ourselves, our own irregularities ; we always internally adopt the interests of the law against ourselves ; we always find within us a justification of the rules against the passions. We cannot corrupt this internal witness of the truth, which pleads within us for virtue ; we always feel a secret misunderstanding between our inclinations and our lights : the law of God, born in our heart, incessantly struggles there against the law of the flesh foreign to man ; it maintains its truths there in spite of ourselves, if it cannot maintain its authority ; it officiates as a censurer, if it cannot serve as a director ; in a word, it renders us unhappy if it cannot render us believers.
and

Thus, in vain do we sometimes give way to all the bitterness of hatred and of revenge ; we immediately feel that this cruel pleasure is not made for the heart of man ; that to hate, is, in fact, to punish ourselves ; and, in returning to ourselves after the transports of passion, we find within us a principle of humanity which disavows their violence, and clearly points out to us, that gentleness and kindness were our first inclinations ; and that, in commanding us to love our brethren, the law of God hath only done so, as to consult the right and most reasonable feelings of our heart, and to reconcile us with ourselves. Thou art more righteous than I, said Saul to David, in the time of his strongest hatred against him. That goodness, born in the heart of all men, forced from him that confession, and inwardly disavowed the injustice and the cruelty of his revenge.

In vain do we plunge ourselves into brutal and sensual gratifications, and madly range after whatever may satisfy the insatiable desires of pleasure ; we quickly feel, that debauchery leads us too far to be agreeable to nature : that whatever enslaves
and

and tyrannises over us, overturns the order of our first institution; and that the gospel, in prohibiting the voluptuous passions, hath provided for the tranquility of our heart, and for restoring to us all its elevation and nobility. How many hired servants of my father's, said the prodigal still bound in the chains of vice, have bread enough, and to spare! and I consume my days in weariness, and in shame. It was a remain of reason and of nobility which still spake in the bottom of his heart.

Lastly, investigate all the precepts of the law of God, and you will feel that they have a necessary connection with the heart of man; that they are rules founded upon a profound knowledge of what takes place within us; that they solely contain the remedies of our most secret evils, and the succours of our most righteous inclinations; and that none but Him alone, who knoweth the bottom of hearts, could be capable of laying down such maxims to men. The heathens themselves, in whom all truth was not yet extinguished, rendered this glory to the Christian morality; they were forced to admire the wisdom of its precepts, the necessity of its restraints, the sanctity of its counsels, the good sense and sublimity of all its rules; they were astonished to find, in the discourses of Jesus Christ, a more sublime philosophy than in the Roman or Grecian schools; and they could not comprehend how the son of Mary should be better acquainted with the duties, the desires, and all the secret folds
of

of the human heart, than Plato and all his disciples.

Will you tell us, after this, that nature is our first law, and that tendencies to pleasures, inherent in our being, can never be crimes ; I have often said it ; it is an impiety only of conversation ; it is an ostentation of free-thinking, of which vanity makes a boast, but which truth inwardly belies. Augustin in his errors had spared no pains to efface from the bottom of his heart, those remains of faith and of conscience which still recalled him to the truth ; he had eagerly fought, in the most impious opinions, and in the most shocking errors, where-withal to comfort himself against his crimes ; his mind flying the light which pursued him, wandered from impiety to impiety, and from error to error ; nevertheless, in spite of all his efforts and flights, the truth, always victorious in the bottom of his soul, proclaimed its triumph in spite of himself ; he could succeed neither in seducing nor in quieting himself in his disorders: “ I bore, O my God, says he, a conscience racked, and still bleeding as it were, from the grievous wounds which my passions incessantly made there ; I was a burden to myself ; I could no longer sustain my own heart ; I turned myself on every side, and no where could it find ease ; I knew not where to lay it, that I might be delivered from it, and that mine anxiety might be comforted.”

Behold

Behold the testimony which a sinner, who, to all the keenness of the passions, added the impiety of opinions, and the abuse of lights, renders of himself. And these examples are of every age; our own has beheld famous and avowed sinners, who made an infamous boast of not believing in God, and who were looked upon as heroes in impiety and free-thinking; we have seen them, touched at last with repentance like Augustin, and recalled from their errors, we have seen them, I say, make an open avowal, that they had never been able to succeed in effacing the rules and truth from their soul; that, amidst all their most shocking impieties and excesses, their heart, still Christian, inwardly belied their derisions and blasphemies; that, before men, they vaunted a strength of mind which forsook them in private; that that apparent unbelief concealed the most cruel remorse, and the most gloomy fears; and that they had never been firm and tranquil in guilt.

Yes, my brethren, guilt, always timorous, every where bears a witness of condemnation against itself. Every where you render homage, by your inward anxieties and remorse, to the sanctity of that law which you violate; every where a fund of weariness and of sorrow, inseparable from guilt, makes you to feel that regularity and innocence are the only happiness which was intended for you on the earth: you vainly display an affected intrepidity; the guilty conscience always betrays itself. Cruel terrors

terrors march every where before you ; solitude disquiets, darkness alarms you ; you fancy to see phantoms coming from every quarter to reproach you with the secret errors of your soul ; unlucky dreams fill you with black and gloomy fancies ; and guilt, after which you run with so much relish, pursues you afterwards like a cruel vulture, and fixes itself upon you, to tear your heart, and to punish you for the pleasure which it had formerly given you. O my God ! what resources hast thou not left in our heart to recal us to thee ! And how powerful is the protection which the goodness and the righteousness of thy law finds in the bottom of our being ! First testimony which the conscience renders to the law of God, a testimony of truth to the sanctity of its maxims.

But it also renders a testimony of severity to the exactitude of its rules. For a second illusion of the greatest part of worldly souls, who live exempted from great irregularities, but who otherwise live amidst all the pleasures, all the abuses, all the sensualities, and all the dissipations authorized by the world, is, that of wishing to persuade themselves that the gospel requires no more, and to persuade us, that their conscience reproaches them with nothing, and that they believe themselves safe in that state. Now, I say that here the worldly conscience is again not candid, and is deceived ; and that, in spite of all those mollifications which they endeavour to justify to themselves, it renders, in the bottom of our hearts, a testimony of severity to the law of God.

In effect, order requires that all our passions be regulated by the bridle of the law; all our inclinations, corrupted in their source, have occasion for a rule to rectify and correct them: we confess this ourselves; we feel that our corruption pervades the smallest as well as the greatest things; that self-love infects all our proceedings; and that we every where find ourselves weak, and in continual opposition to order and duty: we feel, then, that the rule ought, in no instance, to be favourable to our inclinations; that we ought every where to find it severe, because it ought every where to be in opposition to us; that the law cannot be in unity with us; that whatever favours our inclinations, can never be the remedy intended to cure them; that whatever flatters our desires, can never be the bridle which is to restrain them; in a word, that whatever nourishes self-love, is not the law which is established for the sole purpose of destroying and annihilating it. Thus, by an inward feeling, inseparable from our being, we always discriminate ourselves from the law; our inclinations from its rules; our pleasures from its duties; and, in all dubious actions where we decide in favour of our inclinations, we perfectly feel that we are deviating from the law of God, always more rigid than ourselves.

And

And allow me here, my brethren, to appeal to your conscience itself, which you always allege, and to which you continually refer us. Are you, honestly speaking, at your ease, as you wish to persuade us, in this life, altogether of pleasures, of dissipation, of indolence, and of sensuality; in a word, in this worldly life, of which you constantly maintain the innocence? Have you hitherto been able to succeed in persuading yourselves, that it is the path which leads to salvation? Do you not feel that something more is required of you by the gospel than you perform? Would you wish to appear before God with nothing to offer to him but these pleasures, these amusements which you call innocent, and of which the principal groundwork of your life is composed? I put the question to you. In those moments when, more warmly affected perhaps by grace, you propose seriously to think upon eternity, do you not place, in the plan which you then form of a new life, the privation of almost all the very things in which you are continually telling us that you see no harm? Do you not begin by promising to yourselves, that, solely occupied then with your salvation, you will renounce the excesses of gaming, the theatres, the vanities and indecencies of dress, the dissipation of public assemblies and pleasures; that you will devote more time to prayer, to retirement, to holy reading, and to the duties of religion? Now, what is it that you hereby acknowledge, ledge, unless it be, that, while you renounce not all these abuses; that you devote not more time to all these pious duties, you think not seriously upon your salvation; you ought to have no pretension to it; you are in the path of death and perdition.

But, besides, you who carry so far the severity of your censures against the godly, recollect all the rigour of your maxims, and of your derisions upon their conduct; do you not blame, do you not continually censure those persons who wish to connect, with a public profession of piety, those abuses, those amusements, of which you are the daily apologist, and who wish to enjoy the reputation of virtue without losing any of the pleasures of the world? Do you not mock their piety as a piece of mere grimace? Here it is that you emphatically display all the austerity of the Christian life. Do you not say that it is necessary either totally to renounce the world, or to continue to live as the world lives; and that all these ambiguous virtues serve only to decry the true virtue? I agree with you in this; but I reply to you: Your conscience dictates to you that it is not safe to give yourself partially to God, and your conscience reproaches you nothing, as you say, in a life in which God enters not at all? You condemn those mistaken souls whom, at least, an apparent division between the world and Jesus Christ may comfort? And you justify to us your conduct, you who have nothing in its justification
but

but the abuses of the world and the danger of its habits? Do you then believe that the path of salvation is more rugged for those who profess piety than for you? That the world hath privileges thereon, which are forfeited from the moment that we mean to serve God? Be consistent then with yourselves; and either condemn no more a worldly virtue, or no longer justify the world itself; since whatever you blame in that virtue is only that portion of it which the world supplies.

And, in order to make you more sensibly feel how far you are from being candid on this head, you continually take a pride in repeating that we despair of human weakness; that, in order to act up to all that we say in these Christian pulpits, it would be necessary to withdraw to the deserts, or to be angels rather than men: nevertheless, render glory to the force of truth. If a minister of the gospel were to deliver to you from this place a doctrine quite opposite to that which we teach; were he to announce to you the same maxims which you daily hold forth in the world; were he to preach to you in this place of the truth, that the gospel is not so severe as it is published; that we may love the world and yet serve God; that there is no harm in gaming, in pleasures, in theatres, except what we ourselves occasion; that we must live like the world while we live in the world; that all that language of the cross, of penitence, of mortification, and of self-denial, is more calculated for for cloisters than for the court, and for persons of a certain rank ; and, lastly, that God is too good to consider as crimes, a thousand things which are become habitual, and of which we wish you to make a matter of conscience ; were he, I say, to preach these maxims to you in this holy place, what would you think of him ? What would you say to his new doctrine ? What idea would you have of this new apostle ? Would you consider him as a man come down from heaven to announce to you this new gospel ? Would you believe him to be better instructed than we in the holy truths of salvation, and in the rules of the Christian life ? You would laugh at his ignorance, or his folly ; you would perhaps be struck with horror at the profanation which he would make of his ministry.

And what, my brethren, these maxims announced before the altars would appear to you as blasphemy or madness ; and, promulgated in your daily conversations, they would become rules of reason and of wisdom ? In the mouth of a minister of the gospel, you would look upon them as the speeches of a madman ; and, in your mouth, they should appear more solid and more weighty ? You would laugh, or rather you would be struck with horror, at a preacher who should announce them to you ; and you wish to persuade us that you speak seriously, and that you are consistent with yourselves when, with so much confidence, you hold them forth to us.

Ah !

Ah! my brethren, how treacherous we are to God! and how terrible will he be when he shall come to avenge, upon the lights of our own heart, the honour of his holy law! Our apparent obstinacy for the abuses of the world, of which we maintain the innocence, is a secret persuasion that the world and its abuses are a path of perdition; we publicly justify what we condemn in private; we are the hypocrites of the world and of its pleasures; and, through a most deplorable destiny, our life passes away in dissembling with ourselves, and in obstinately determining to perish in spite of ourselves. And surely, says the apostle John, if our heart, notwithstanding all our self-blindness, cannot help already condemning us in secret, have we more indulgence to expect from the terrible and sovereign Judge of hearts than from our heart itself?

Thus, my brethren, study the law of God in your own conscience, and you will see that it is not more favourable than we to your passions; consult the lights of your heart, and you will feel that they perfectly accord with our maxims; listen to the voice of truth, which speaks within you, and you will admit, that we only repeat what it is continually whispering to your heart? You have no occasion, says St Augustin, to apply to able men, in order to have the greatest part of your doubts cleared up; go no farther than yourselves for explanations and answers; apply to yourselves
for

for what you have to do ; listen to the decisions of your heart ; follow the first impulse of your conscience, and you will always determine for that party most conformable to the law of God : the first impression of the heart is always for the strictness of the law against the softening of self-love : your conscience will always go farther, and will be more strict than ourselves ; and, if you have occasion for our decisions, it will rather be in order to moderate the severity, than to expose the false indulgence of it.

Behold the first manner in which the law of God shall one day judge us : that law, manifested in the conscience of the sinner, and as if born with him, shall rise up against him ; our heart, marked with the seal of truth, shall be the witness to depose for our condemnation : our lights shall be opposed to our actions, our remorse to our manners, our speeches to our thoughts, our inward sentiments to our public proceedings, and ourselves to ourselves. Thus we bear, each of us, our condemnation in our own heart. The Lord will not bring other proof than ourselves, to determine the decision of our eternal reprobation ; and the soul before the tribunal of God, says Tertulian, shall appear at the same time, both the criminal condemned, and the witness which shall testify against his crimes. He will have nothing to reply, continues this father. You knew the truth will be said to him, and you iniquitously withheld it ;

it ; you admitted of the happiness of the souls who seek only God, and you sought him not yourselves : you drew shocking pictures of the world, of its wearinesses, of its perfidies, and of its wickednesses, and you were always its slave and blinded worshipper : you inwardly respected the religion of your fathers, and you made a deplorable vaunt of impiety : you secretly dreaded the judgments of God, and you affected not to believe in him. In the bottom of your heart you rendered justice to the piety of the godly : you proposed to resemble them at some future period ; and you tore and persecuted them with your derisions and censures : in a word, your lights have ever been for God, and your actions for the world.

O my God ! to what do men not carry their ingratitude and folly ! Thou hast placed in us lights inseparable from our being, which, by disturbing the false peace of our passions and errors, continually recall us to order and to the truth ; and, through an imposition of vanity, we make a boast of being tranquil in our errors ; we glory in a peace which thy mercy is still willing to disturb ; and, far from publishing the riches of thy grace upon our soul, which leaves us still open to the truth, we vaunt an obstinacy and a blindness which sooner or latter shall be realised, and shall, at last, be the just punishment of an ingratitude and of a deceit so injurious to thy grace. First character of the evidence of the law of God ; it is evident in the conscience of the sinner ; but it is likewise so in the simplicity of its rules.

PART II. Since man is the work of God, man can no longer live but conformably to the will of his author ; and since God hath of man made his work, and his most perfect work, he could never leave him to live by chance upon the earth without manifesting to him his will, that is to say, without pointing out to him what he owed to his Creator, to his fellow-creatures, and to himself. Therefore, in creating him, he imprinted in his being a living light, incessantly visible to his heart, which regulated all his duties. But all flesh having perverted its way, and the abundance of iniquity, which had prevailed over the earth, (unable, it is true, to efface that light entirely from the heart of men), no longer permitting them to reflect, or to consult it, and apparently no longer even maintaining itself in them, unless to render them more inexcusable ; God, whose mercies seem to become more abundant in proportion as the wickedness of men increases, caused to be engraven, on tables of stone, that law which nature, that is to say, which himself had engraven on our hearts : he placed before our eyes the law which we bear within us, in order to recall us to ourselves. Nevertheless, the people, who were its first depositaries, having again disfigured it by interpretations which adulterated its purity, Jesus Christ, the wisdom and the light of God, came last upon the earth to restore to it its original beauty; to purge it from the alterations of the synagogue; to dissipate the obscurities which a false learning and human traditions had spread through it; to lay open all its sublimity; to apply its rules to our wants; and, in leaving to us his gospel, no longer to leave an excuse, either to the ignorance or to the wickedness of those who violate its precepts.

last at

Nevertheless, the second pretext which is opposed in the world to the evidence of the law of God, is the pretended ambiguity of its rules: they accuse us of making the gospel to say whatever we wish; they contest, they find answers, they spread obscurities through all; and they darken the law in such a manner, that the world itself insists on having the gospel on its side.

Now, I say that, besides the evidence of the conscience, the law of God is also evident in the simplicity of its rules; and, consequently, that the sinners, who wish thus to justify their iniquitous ways, shall one day be overthrown, both by the testimony of their own heart, and by the evidence of the holy rules.

Yes, my brethren, the law of God, says the prophet, is pure, enlightening the eyes even of those who would wish to conceal it from themselves. In effect, Jesus Christ, in coming himself to give to us a law of life and of truth for the regulation of our manners and our duties, and in which the evidence could not be too great, could never

never undoubtedly have meant to leave obscurities in it capable of deluding us, and of favouring passions which he expressly came to overthrow. Human laws may be liable to these inconveniences: the mind of man, which hath invented them, being unable to foresee all, it hath also been unable to obviate all the difficulties which might one day arise in the minds of other men, on the strength of its expressions, and even on the nature of its rules. But the spirit of God, author of the holy rules held out in the gospel, hath foreseen all the doubts which the human mind could oppose to his law: he hath read, in the hearts of all men to come, the obscurities which their corruption might shed over the nature of his rules: consequently, he hath concerted them in a manner so divine and so intelligible, so simple and so sublime, that the most ignorant, equally as the most learned, can never misconstrue his intentions, and be ignorant of the ways of eternal life.

It is true, that sacred obscurities conceal in it the incomprehensible mysteries of faith; but the rules of the manners are explicit and precise; the duties are there evident; and nothing can be more clear, or less equivocal, than the precepts of Jesus Christ. Not but that doubts and difficulties may spring up in the detail of the obligations; that the assemblage of a thousand different circumstances may not, in such a manner, darken the rule, that it may sometimes escape the most learned; and that, upon all the infinite duties of stations and conditions, all be so decided in the gospel, that mistakes cannot often take place.
th at,

But I say, (and I intreat of you to pursue these reflections which to me appear of the utmost consequence, and to comprise all the rules of the manners,) in the first place, that if, upon the detail of duties, the letter of the law be sometimes dubious, the spirit of it is almost never so: that it is easily seen to which side the gospel inclines, and to what the analogy and ruling spirit of its maxims lead us: I say, that they mutually clear up each other; that they all go to the same end; that they are like so many rays, which, uniting in one centre, form so grand a lustre that it is impossible longer to mistake them; that there are principal rules which serve to elucidate every particular difficulty; and, lastly, that, if the law appear sometimes equivocal to us, the intention of the legislator, by which we ought to interpret it, never leaves room for either doubt or mistake.

Thus, you would wish to know, you who live at the court, where ambition is, as it were, the virtue of persons of your rank; you would wish to know if it be a crime ardently to long for the honours and the prosperities of the earth, to be never satisfied with your station, continually to wish advancement, and to connect, with that single desire, all your views, all your proceedings, all your cares, the whole foundation of your life. In answer swer to this, you are there told, that your heart ought to be where your treasure is ; that is to say, in the desire and in the hope of eternal riches ; and that the Christian is not of this world. Decide thereupon the difficulty yourselves.

You demand if continual gaming, amusements, theatres, and so many other pleasures, so innocent in the eyes of the world, ought to be banished from the Christian life. You are there told, that blessed are they who weep ; and that evil to those who laugh, and who receive their consolation in this world. Follow the spirit of this rule, and see to what it leads.

You enquire if, having to live in the world, you ought to live like the world ; if we would wish to condemn almost all men who live like you ; and if, in order to serve God, it be necessary to affect singularities which excite the ridicule of other men. You are there told, that we are not to conform to this corrupted age ; that it is impossible to please men and to be the servant of Jesus Christ ; and that the multitude is always the party of the reprobate. You have now to say whether the answer be explicit.

You doubt, if, having pardoned your enemy, you be also obliged to see him, to serve him, to assist him with your wealth and credit ; and if it be not more equitable to reserve your favours and preferences for your friends. You are there told : do good to those who have wished evil to you ;
speak

ſpeak well of thoſe who calumniate you ; love thoſe who hate you. Enter into the ſpirit of this precept, and ſay if it doth not ſhed a light over your doubt, which inſtantly clears it up and diſſipates it.

Laſtly, propoſe as many doubts as you pleaſe upon duties, and it will be eaſy for you to decide them by the ſpirit of the law, if the letter ſay nothing of them ; for the letter kills me, ſays the apoſtle : that is to ſay, to ſtop there, to look upon as duty only what is literally marked, to ſtop at the rude limits, and to enter no farther into the principle and into the ſpirit which vivifies, is to be a Jew, and to be willing to be ſelf-deceived. No longer tell us then, my brethren, when we condemn ſo many abuſes which you, without ſcruple, allow yourſelves : “ But the goſpel ſays nothing of “ them.” Ah ! the goſpel ſays every thing to thoſe who wiſh to underſtand it : the goſpel leaves nothing undecided to whoever loves the law of God : the goſpel is competent to all, to whoever ſearches it, only for inſtruction ; and it goes ſo much the farther, and ſays ſo much the more, as that, without ſtopping to regulate a particular detail, it regulates the paſſions themſelves ; that, without detailing all the actions, it goes to repreſs thoſe inclinations which are the ſources of them ; and that, without confining itſelf to certain external circumſtances of the manners, it propoſes to us, as rules of duty, only ſelf denial, hatred of the world, world, love of sufferance, contempt for whatever takes place, and the whole extent of its crucifying maxims : first reflection.

I say, in the second place, that it is not the obscurity of the law, but our passions, still dear, which give rise to all our doubts upon the duties ; that the worldly souls are those who find most difficulty and most obscurity in the rules of the manners ; that nothing appears clear to those who would wish that nothing were so ; that every thing appears doubtful to those who have an interest in its being so : I say, with St Augustin, that it is a willing spirit alone which gives understanding of the precepts ; that, unless the rules and duties are loved, they can never be thoroughly known ; that we enter into the truth only through charity ; and that the sincere desire of salvation is the grand solver of all difficulties : I say that faithful and fervent souls have almost never any thing to oppose to the law of God ; and that their doubts are rather pious alarms upon holy actions, than pretexts and difficulties to authorise profane ones.

Men have learned to doubt upon the rules of the manners, only since they have wished to connect them with their iniquitous passions. Alas ! all was almost decided for the first believers : in these happy ages, we see not that the first pastors of the church had many difficulties to resolve upon the detail of the duties : those immense volumes, which decide their doubts by endless resolutions, have

have appeared only with the corruption of manners: in proportion as believers have had more passions to satisfy, they have had more doubts to propose; it hath been necessary to multiply volumes upon volumes, in order to resolve difficulties which cupidity alone formed; difficulties already all resolved in the gospel, and upon which the first ages of faith would have been scandalised, that they had dared to form even a doubt. Our ages, still more dissolute than those which preceded us, have still beheld these enormous collections of cases and resolutions increasing and multiplying to infinity: all the most incontestible rules of the morality of Jesus Christ are there become almost problems; there is no duty upon which corruption hath not had difficulties to propose, and to which a false learning hath not found mollifications: every thing has there been agitated, contested, and put in doubt: the mind of man hath there been seen quibbling with the spirit of God, and substituting human doctrines in place of that doctrine which Jesus Christ hath brought to us from heaven; and although we pretend not universally to blame all those pious and able men, who have left to us these laborious masses of decisions, it had been to be wished that the church had never called in such aids; and we cannot help looking upon them as remedies which are themselves become diseases, and as the sad fruits of the necessity of the times, of the depravity of manners, and of the decay of truth among men.

Doubts upon the duties arise, therefore, from the corruption of our hearts, much more than from the obscurities of the rules. The light of the law, says St Augustin, resembles that of the sun; but vainly doth it shine, glitter, enlighten; the blind are unaffected by it: now, every sinner is that blind person; the light is near to him, surrounds him, penetrates him, enters from every quarter into his soul; but he is always himself far from the light. Purify your heart, continues that holy father; remove from it the fatal bandage of the passions; then shall you clearly see all your duties, and all your doubts shall vanish. Thus we continually see that, when touched with grace, a soul begins to adopt solid measures for eternity, his eyes are opened upon a thousand truths which, till then, he had concealed from himself: in proportion as his passions diminish, his lights increase; he is astonished by what means he could so long have shut his eyes upon truths which now appear to him so evident and so incontestible; and, far from a sacred guide having then occasion to contest, and to maintain against him the interests of the law of God, his prudence is required to conceal, as I may say, from that contrite soul, the whole extent and all the terrors of the holy truths; to quiet him on the horror of past irregularities, and to moderate the fears into which he is thrown by the novelty and the surprife of his lights. It is not then the rules which are cleared up, it is the foul which frees itfelf from, and quits its blindnefs; it is not the law of God which becomes more evident, it is the eyes of the heart which are opened to its luftre; in a word, it is not the gofpel, but the finner who is changed.
and

And a frefh proof of what I advance is, that, upon thofe points of the law where no particular paffion or intereft blinds us, we are equitable and clear-fighted. A mifer, who hides from himfelf the rules of faith, upon the infatiable love of riches, clearly fees the maxims which condemn ambition or luxury. A voluptuary, who tries to juftify to himfelf the weaknefs of his inclinations, gives no quarter to the mean defires, and to the fordid attachments of avarice. A man, mad for exaltation and fortune, and who confiders the eternal exertions which he is under the neceffity of making, in order to fucceed, as weighty and ferious cares, and alone worthy his birth and his name, fees all the unworthinefs of a life of amufement and pleafure, and clearly comprehends that a man, born with a name, degrades and difhonours himfelf by lazinefs and indolence. A woman, feized with the rage of gaming, yet otherwife regular, is inveterate againft the flighteft faults which attack the conduct, and continually juftifies the innocence of exceffive gaming, by contrafting it with irregularities of another defcription, from which fhe finds herfelf free.

Another,

Another, on the contrary, intoxicated with her person and with her beauty, totally engrossed by her deplorable passions, considers that obstinate perseverance in an eternal gaming as a kind of disease and derangement of the mind, and, in the shame of her own engagements, sees nothing but an innocent weakness and involuntary inclinations, the destiny of which we find in our hearts.

Review all the passions, and you will see that, in proportion as we are exempted from some one, we see, we condemn it in others; we know the rules which forbid it; we go even to the rigour against others, upon the observance of duties which interest not our own weaknesses, and we carry our severity beyond even the rule itself. The Pharisees, so instructed in, and so severe upon the guilt of the adulterers, and upon the punishments attached by the law to the infamy of that infidelity, saw not their own pride, their hypocrisy, their implacable hatred, and their secret envy against Jesus Christ. Obscurities are only in our own heart; and we never begin to doubt upon our duties, but when we begin to love those maxims which oppose them. Second reflection.

In effect, I tell you, in the third place, you believe that the gospel is not so express as we pretend, upon the greater part of the rules which we wish to prescribe to you; that we carry its severity to excess, and that we make it to say whatever we please. Hear it then itself, my brethren; we consent consent that, of all the duties prescribed to you by it, you shall think yourselves obliged to observe only those which are marked there in terms so precise and clear that it is impossible to mistake or misconstrue them: more is not required of you, and we free you from all the rest. Hear it then:

“ And whosoever doth not bear his cross, and “ come after me, cannot be my disciple. Who“ soever he be of you, that forsaketh not all that “ he hath, he cannot be my disciple. The king“ dom of heaven suffereth violence, and the vio“ lent take it by force. Except ye repent, ye “ shall all likewise perish. Ye cannot serve God “ and mammon. Wo unto you that are full;
“ for ye shall hunger. Wo unto you that laugh
“ now; for ye shall mourn and weep. Blessed “ are they that weep now; for ye shall laugh. He
“ that loveth his father, his wife, his children, “ yea, and his life also, better than me, is not “ worthy of me. I say unto you that ye shall “ weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice;
“ and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall
“ be turned into joy.”

Do I speak here my brethren? Do I come to deceive you by an excess of severity, to add to the gospel, and to bring you only my own thoughts? Weak creature that I am, I have occasion myself for indulgence; and if I took in the weakness of my own heart, the doctrine which I announce to you, alas! I would speak to you only the language of man: I would tell you that God is too good to punish inclinations which are born, it would appear, with us; that, to love God, it is not necessary to hate one's self: that, when rich, we ought to enjoy our wealth, and allow ourselves every gratification. Behold the language which I would hold; for man, delivered up to himself, can speak only this language of flesh and blood. But would you believe me, as I have already demanded; would you respect my ministry; would you look upon me as an angel from heaven, who should come to announce to you this new gospel.
of

That of Jesus Christ speaks another language to you; I have related to you only his own divine words; these are the duties which he prescribes to you in clear and express terms. We consent that you confine your whole piety to these limits, and that you leave all the rest as doubtful, or, at least, commanded in terms less clear, and more susceptible of favourable interpretations. Reckon not among your duties, but these holy and incontestible rules; we exact nothing more; limit yourselves to performing what they prescribe to you; and you will see that you shall do more than we even demand of you; and that the most common and most familiar maxims of the gospel go infinitely farther than all our discourses. Third reflection.

I also say to you, in the fourth place, that, if almost all be contested in the world, upon the most incontestible duties of Christian piety, it is because the gospel is a book unknown to the greatest part of believers; it is that, through a deplorable abuse, a whole life is passed in acquiring vain learning, equally useless to man, to his happiness, and to his eternity; and the book of the law is never read, in which is contained the knowledge of salvation, the truth which is to deliver us, the light which is to conduct us, the titles of our hopes, the testimony of our immortality, the consolations of our exilement, and the aids of our pilgrimage: it is that, on entering into the world, care is taken to present to us those books, in which are explained the rules of that profession to which we are allotted; and that the book of the law, in which the rules of the profession of the Christian are contained, that profession which shall survive all others, alone necessary, and the only one which shall accompany us into eternity; that book, I say, is left in neglect, and enters not into the plan of studies which ought to occupy our earlier years; lastly, it is that fabulous and lascivious histories childishly amuse our leisure; and that the history of God's wonders and mercies upon men, filled with events so grand, so weighty, so interesting, which ought to be the sole occupation, and the whole consolation of our life, does not appear to us worthy even of our curiosity.
the

I am not surpris'd, after this, if we have continual occasion to maintain the gospel against the abuses and the prejudices of the world; if we are listened

listened to with the same surprize, when we announce the commonest truths of the Christian morality, as though we announced the belief and the mysteries of those savage and far distant nations, whose countries and manners are hardly known; and if the doctrine of Jesus Christ find the same opposition at present in minds that it experienced at the birth of faith, it is, that there are Christians to whom the book of the gospel is almost equally unknown as it then was to the heathens; who scarcely know whether Jesus Christ be come to bring laws to men, and who cannot, for a single moment, support, without weariness, the reading of that divine book, the rules of which are so sublime, the promises so consoling, and of which the pagans themselves, who embraced faith, so much admired the beauty and the divine philosophy. Thus, my brethren, read the holy books, and read them with that spirit of faith, of submission, of trust, which the church exacts, and you will soon be as well acquainted with your duties, and with the rules of the manners, as the doctors themselves who teach you.

And indeed, my brethren, whence comes it, I beg of you, that the first believers carried so far the purity of manners, and the holiness of Christianity? Were other maxims announced to them than those which we announce to you? Was another gospel preached to them, more clear and more explicit than that which we preach to you?

Nevertheless,

Nevertheless, they were idolatrous and dissolute nations, who had brought, to the truths of faith, all the prejudices of the superstitions, and of the most infamous voluptuousnesses authorised even by their worship. Did the gospel contain the smallest obscurities favourable to the passions, it surely ought to have been those first disciples of faith who should have made the mistake. Nevertheless, whence comes it that they never proposed to the apostles and to their successors the same difficulties which you continually oppose to us, in support of the abuses of the world, and of the interests of the passions? Whence comes it, that, with more inclinations and more prejudices than we for pleasures, those blessed believers at once comprehended how far, in order to obey the gospel, it was necessary to deny them to themselves?

Ah! it was that, night and day, they had the book of the law in their hands: it was that patience, and the consolation of the scriptures, were the sweetest occupation of their faith; it was that the letters of the holy apostles, and the relation of the life and of the maxims of Jesus Christ, were the sole bond, and the daily conversations of these infant churches; in a word, it is that, to whoever reads the gospel, whatever regards the duties is quickly decided. Fourth reflection.

Lastly, I say, even admitting that some obscurities should be found there, doth not the law of God find all its evidence in instruction and in the ministry? The Christian pulpits announce to you the purity of the holy maxims; the pastors publicly preach them; men, full of zeal and of knowledge, convey them down to posterity, in works worthy of the better times of the church; never had the piety of believers more aids; no age ever was more enlightened, or better knew the spirit of faith and the whole extent of duties. We no longer live in those ages of ignorance in which the rules subsisted only in the abuses which had adulterated them; in which the ministry was often an occasion of error and of scandal for believers; and in which the priest was considered as more enlightened, whenever he was more superstitious than his people.

It would seem, O my God! that, in order to render us more inexcusable, in proportion as the wickedness of men increases on the one side, the knowledge of the truth, which is to condemn them, augments on the other; in proportion as the manners become corrupted, the rules become more evident; in proportion as faith becomes languid, it is cleared up and purified; like those fires which, in expiring, give a momentary flash, and never display their lustre with such brilliancy as when on the eve of being extinguished.

Not that there are not still among us many blind guides and prophets who announce their own dreams. But the snare is to be dreaded only by those who are willing to be deceived: when sincerely

ſincerely inclined to ſeek the Lord, we ſoon find the hand which knows to lead us to him : it is not then, properly ſpeaking, the falſe guides who lead us aſtray, it is ourſelves who ſeek them, becauſe we wiſh to err with them ; they are not the firſt authors of our ruin, they are only the encouragers of it ; they do not lead us into the path of perdition, they only leave us there ; and we are already determined to periſh before we apply for their ſuffrage. In effect, we ſenſibly feel ourſelves the danger and the imprudence of the choice we make ; even the more we find the oracle complying, the more we miſtruſt his lights ; the more he reſpects our paſſions, the leſs we reſpect his miniſtry ; he is frequently made the ſubject even of our deriſions ; we turn into ridicule that very indulgence which we have ſought ; we vaunt the having found a protector ſo convenient for the human weakneſſes ; and, through a blindneſs which cannot be mentioned without tears, the ſoul and eternal ſalvation are confiſed to a man who is believed unworthy, not only of reſpect, but even of attention and decency ; like thoſe Iſraelites who, a moment after having bowed the knee to the golden calf, and expected from it their ſalvation and their deliverance, broke it in pieces with diſgrace, and reduced it to aſhes.

But, after all, when the ignorance or the weakening of miniſters ſhould even be an occaſion of error, the examples of the holy undeceive you.

You

You see what, from the beginning, hath been the path of those who have obtained the promises, and whose memory and holy toils we still honour upon the earth : you see that none of them hath accomplished his salvation by that way which the world vaunts as being so safe and so innocent : you see that all the holy have repented, crucified their flesh, despised the world with its pleasures and maxims : you see that those ages, so opposite to each other for their manners and customs, have never made any change in the manners of the just ; that the holy of the first times were the same as those of the last ; that the countries, even the most dissimilar for their disposition and behaviour, have produced holy, all resembling each other ; that those of the most distant climates, and the most different from our own, resemble those of our nation ; that, in every tongue and in every tribe, they have all been the same ; lastly, that their situations have been different ; that some have wrought out their salvation in obscurity, others in elevation ; some in poverty, others in abundance ; some in the dissipation of dignities and of public cares, others in silence and in the calm of solitude : in a word, some in the cottage, others on the throne ; but that the cross, violence, and self-denial hath been the common path of all.

What then art thou, to pretend to reach heaven by other ways : and thou flatterest thyself that, in that crowd of illustrious servants of the living God,

God, thou alone shalt be privileged? My God! with what lustre hast thou not surrounded the truth, in order to render man inexcusable! His conscience shews it to him; thy holy law guards it for him; the voice of the church makes it to resound in his ears; the example of thy holy incessantly places it before his eyes; every thing rises up against guilt; all take the interests of thy holy law against his false peace; from every quarter proceed rays of light which go to bear the truth even to the bottom of his soul: no place, no situation can protect him from those divine sparks emitted from thy bosom, which every where pursue him, and which, in enlightening, rack him: the truth, which ought to deliver him, renders him unhappy; and, unwilling to love its light, he is forced, before hand, to feel its just severity.

What then, my dear hearer, prevents the truth from triumphing in your heart? Wherefore do you change, into an inexhaustible source of cruel remorse, lights which ought to be, within you, the whole consolation of your sorrows? Since, by a consequence of the riches of God's mercy upon your soul, you cannot succeed, like so many impious and hardened hearts, to stifle that internal monitor which incessantly recalls you to order and duty, why will you obstinately withstand the happiness of your lot? Why so many efforts to defend you from yourself? So many starts and flights to shun yourself? At last, reconcile your hearts with with your lights, your conscience with your manners, yourself with the law of God; behold the only secret of attaining to that peace of heart which you seek. Turn yourself on every side, you must always come to that. Observance of the law is the true happiness of man: it is deceiving himself to look upon it as a yoke: it alone places the heart at liberty. Whatever favours our passions, sharpens our ills, increases our troubles, multiplies our bonds, and aggravates our slavery; the law of God alone, in repressing them, places us in order, quiets, cures, and delivers us. Such is the destiny of sinful man, to be incapable of happiness here below, but by overcoming his passions; to attain by violence alone to the true pleasures of the heart, and afterwards to that eternal peace prepared for those who shall have loved the law of the Lord.

SER-

SERMON IV.

IMMUTABILITY OF THE LAW OF GOD.

JOHN viii. 46.

And if I say the truth, why do ye not believe me ?

IT is not enough to have defended the evidence of the law of God against the affected ignorance of the sinners who violate it ; it is necessary likewise to establish its immutability against all the pretexts which seem to authorize the world to dispense itself from its holy rules.

Jesus Christ is not satisfied with announcing to the Pharisees that the truth which they know shall one day judge them ; that in vain they concealed it from themselves ; and that the guilt of the truth, known and contemned, would be for ever upon their head. It is through the evidence of the law that he at first recalls them to their own conscience ;

science; he afterwards accuses them of having struck even at its immutability; of substituting human customs and traditions in place of the perpetuity of its rules; of accommodating them to times, to circumstances, and to interests; and declares to them that, even to the end of ages, a single jota shall not be changed in his law; that heaven and the earth shall pass away, but that his law and his holy word shall for ever be the same.

And behold, my brethren, the abuses which still reign among us against the law of God. We have shewn to you that, in spite of the doubts and the obscurities which our lusts have spread over our duties, the light of the law, always superior to our passions, dissipated, in spite of ourselves, these obscurities, and that we were never hearty in the transgressions which we tried to justify to ourselves. But it is little to be willing, like the Pharisees, to darken the evidence of the law; like them, we likewise strike at its immutability; and, as if the law of God could change with the manners of the age, the differences of conditions, the necessity of situations, we believe that we can accommodate it to these three different circumstances, and in them find pretexts, either to mollify its severity, or altogether to violate its precepts.

1stly, In effect, the heart of men is changeable; every age sees new customs spring up among us; times and the customs always determine our manners: now, the law of God is immutable in its duration, ration, always the same in all times and in all places; and, by this first character of immutability, it alone ought to be the constant and perpetual rule of our manners: first reflection.

2dly, The heart of man is vain; whatever levels us with the rest of men, wounds our pride; we love distinctions and preferences; we believe that, in the elevation of rank and of birth, we find privileges against the law: now, the law of God is immutable in its extent; it levels all stations and all conditions; it is the same for the great and for the people, for the prince and for the subject; and, by this second character of immutability, it ought to recall to the same duties that variety of stations and conditions which spreads so much inequality over the detail of manners and of the rules: second reflection.

Lastly, The heart of man connects every thing with itself; he persuades himself that his interests ought to be preferred to the law and to the interests of God himself; the slightest inconveniencies are reasons, in his eyes, against the rule: now, the law of God is immutable in all situations of life; and, by this last character of immutability, there is neither perplexity, nor inconveniency, nor apparent necessity, which can dispense us from its precepts: last reflection.

And behold the three pretexts, which the world opposes to the immutability of the law of God, overthrown: the pretext of manners and customs;

the pretext of rank and of birth ; the pretext of situations and inconveniencies. The law of God is immutable in its duration ; therefore, the manners and the customs can never change it : the law of God is immutable in its extent ; therefore, the difference of ranks and of conditions leaves it every where the same : the law of God is immutable in all situations ; therefore, inconveniencies, perplexities, never justify the smallest transgression of it.

PART I. One of the most urgent and most usual reproaches which the first supporters of religion formerly made to the heathens, was the instability of their moral system, and the continual fluctuations of their doctrine. As the fullness of truth was not in vain philosophy, and as they drew not their lights, said Tertullian, from that sovereign reason which enlightens all minds, and which is the immutable teacher of the truth ; but from the corruption of their heart, and the vanity of their thoughts ; they qualified good and evil according to their caprices, and, among them, vice and virtue were almost arbitrary names. Nevertheless, continues this father, the most inseparable character of truth, is that of being always the same : good and evil take their immutability from that of God himself, whom they glorify or insult ; his wisdom, his holiness, his righteousness, are the only eternal rules of our manners ; and it belongs not to men, at their pleasure, to change
what

what men have not established, and what is more ancient than men themselves.

Now, it was not surprising that morality had nothing determinate, in the heathen schools, delivered up to the pride, and to the variations of the human mind; it was vanity, and not the truth, which made philosophers; the rules changed with the ages; new times brought new laws: in a word, the tenets did not change the manners; it was the change of manners which drew after it that of the tenets.

But, what is astonishing, is, that Christians, who have received from heaven the eternal and immutable law which regulates their manners, believe it to be equally changeable as the morality of philosophers; that they persuade themselves that the rigorous duties, which the gospel at first prescribed to the primitive ages of the church, are mollified with the relaxation of manners, and are no longer made for the weakness and the corruption of our ages.

In effect, the gospel, the law of Jesus Christ, is immutable in its duration: seeing every thing change around it, it alone changes not; the duties which it prescribes to us, founded upon the wants and upon the nature of man, are, like it, of all times and of all places. Every thing changes upon the earth, because every thing partakes of the mutability of its origin; empires and states have their rise and their fall; arts and sciences fall

fall or spring up with the ages ; customs continually change with the taste of the people, and with climates ; from on high, in his immutability, God seems to sport with human affairs, by leaving them in an eternal revolution : the ages to come will destroy what we, with so much anxiety, rear up ; we destroy what our fathers had thought worthy of an eternal duration ; and, in order to teach us in what estimation we ought to hold things here below, God permitteth that they have nothing determinate or solid, but that very inconstancy which incessantly agitates them.

But, amid all the changes of manners and ages, the law of God remains always the immutable rule of ages and of manners. Heaven and the earth shall pass away ; but the holy words of the law shall never pass away : such as the first believers received them at the birth of faith, such have we them at present, such shall our descendants one day receive them ; lastly, such shall the blessed in heaven eternally love and adore them. The fervour or the licentiousness of ages add or diminish nothing to their indulgence, or from their severity ; the zeal or the complaisance of men, renders them neither more austere, nor more accommodating. The intolerant rigour, or the excessive relaxation of opinions and tenets, leaves them all the wise sobriety of their rules ; and they form that eternal gospel which the angel, in the Revelation, lation, announces from on high in heaven, from the beginning, to every tongue and to every nation.

Nevertheless, my brethren, when, in the manners of the primitive believers, we sometimes represent to you all the duties of the gospel exactly fulfilled, their freedom from the world, their absence from theatres and public pleasures, their assiduity in the temples, the modesty and the decency of their dress, their charity for their brethren, their indifference for all perishable things, their continual desire of going to be re-united to Jesus Christ; in a word, that simple, retired, and mortified life, sustained by fervent prayer, and by the consolation of the holy books, and such, in effect, as the gospel prescribes to all the disciples of faith; when we bring forward to you, I say, these ancient models, in order to make you feel, by the difference betwixt the primitive manners and yours, how distant you are from the kingdom of God; far from being alarmed at finding yourselves dissimilar to such a degree, that hardly could it be believed that you were disciples of the same Master, and followers of the same law; you reproach us with continually recalling, even to weariness, these primitive times, of never speaking but of the primitive church, as if it were possible to regulate our manners, upon manners of which every trace hath long been done away, impracticable at present among us, and which the times and customs have universally abolished. You say, that men must be taken

taken as they are; that it were to be wished that the primitive fervour had been kept up in the church; but that every thing becomes relaxed and weakened through time, and that, to pretend to bring us back to the life of the primitive ages, is not holding out means of salvation, but is merely preaching up that nobody can now pretend to it.

But I demand of you, in the first place, my brethren, if the times and the years, which have so much adulterated the purity of Christianity, have adulterated that of the gospel? Are the rules become more pliable and more favourable to the passions, because men are become more sensual and more voluptuous? And hath the relaxation of manners softened the maxims of Jesus Christ? When he hath foretold in the gospel, that, in the latter times, that is to say, in the ages in which we have the misfortune to live, faith should almost no longer be found upon the earth, that his name should hardly be known there, that his maxims should be destroyed, that the duties should be incompatible with the customs, and that the just themselves should allow themselves to be almost infected by the universal contagion, and to be dragged away by the torrent of example; hath he then added, that, in order to accommodate himself to the corruption of these latter times, he would relax something of the severity of his gospel; that he would consent that customs, established by the ignorance and the licentiousness of the ages, should succeed to the

the

the rules and to the duties of his doctrine ; that he would then exact of his disciples infinitely less than he exacted at the birth of faith ; and that his kingdom, which, at first, was promised only to force, should then be granted to indolence and laziness ? Hath he added this, I demand of you ? On the contrary, he warns his disciples that then, in these latter times, it will, more than ever, be necessary to pray, to fast, to retire to the mountains, in order to shun the general corruption : he warns them, that wo unto those who shall then remain exposed amid the world ; that those alone shall be safe who shall divest themselves of all, and who shall fly from amid the cities ; and he concludes, by exhorting them once more to watch and to pray without ceasing, in order not to be included in the general condemnation.

And, in effect, my brethren, the more disorders augment, the more ought piety to be fervent and watchful ; the more we are surrounded with dangers, the more doth prayer, retreat, mortification, become necessary to us. The licentiousness of the present manners adds still new obligations to those of our fathers ; and, far from the path of salvation having become more easy than in those former times, we shall perish with a moderate virtue, which, supported then by the common example, would perhaps have been sufficient to secure our salvation.

Besides,

Besides, my brethren, I demand of you, in the second place, do you really believe that the rigorous precepts of the gospel, those maxims of the cross, of violence, of self-denial, of contempt for the world, have been made only for the primitive ages of faith? Do you believe that Jesus Christ hath destined all the rigours of his doctrine for those chaste, innocent, charitable, and fervent men, who lived in these happy times of the church; those men who denied themselves every pleasure, those primitive heroes of religion, who, almost all, preserved, even to the end, the grace of regeneration which had made them Christians? What, my brethren, Jesus Christ would have rewarded their zeal and their fidelity only by aggravating their yoke, and he would have reserved all his indulgence for the corrupted men of our ages? Jesus Christ would have made strict laws of reserve, of modesty, of retirement, only for those primitive Christian women who renounced all to please him; who divided themselves only with the Lord and their husbands; who, shut up in the inclosure of their houses, brought up their children in faith and in piety? And he would exact less at present of those sensual, voluptuous, and worldly women, who continually wound our eyes by the indecency of their dress, and who corrupt the heart by the looseness of their manners, and by the snares which they lay for innocence? And where would here be that so much vaunted equity and wisdom of the Christian

Christian morality? More should then be exacted of him who owes less? The transgressions of the law should then dispense from its severity those who violate it? It would suffice to have passions, to be entitled to gratify them? The way of heaven would be rendered easy to sinners, while all its roughness would be kept for the just? And the more vices men should have, the less should they have occasion for virtues?

Again allow me, my brethren, to add, in the last place, if the change of manners could change the rules, if customs could justify abuses, the eternal law of God should then accommodate itself to the inconstancy of the times, and to the ridiculous taste of men: a gospel would then be necessary for every age and for every nation; for our customs were not established in the times of our fathers, and undoubtedly they shall not pass to our last descendants; they are not common to all the nations who, like us, worship Jesus Christ. Therefore, these customs cannot either become our rule or change it; for the rule is of all times and of all places; therefore, new manners do not form a new gospel, seeing we should anathematise even an angel who should come to announce to us a new one; and that the gospel would be no longer but a human, and little to be trusted law for men, if it could change with men: therefore, the rules and duties are not to be judged by manners and customs, but the manners and customs are to be judged by the duties and rules : therefore, it is the law of God which ought to be the constant rule of the times, and not the variation of times to become even the rule of the law of God.

No longer tell us then, my brethren, that the times are no longer the same ; but the law of God, is it not ? That you cannot reform manners universally established ; but you are not charged with the reformation of the universe : change yourself ; save your own soul with which you are entrusted ; behold all that is exacted of you : lastly ; that the Christians of the primitive times had either more force or more grace than we : ah ! they had more faith, more constancy, more love for Jesus Christ, more contempt for the world : behold all that distinguished them from us.

Have we not the same sources of grace as they, the same ministry, the same altar, the same victim ? Do the mercies of the Lord not flow with the same abundance upon his church ? Have we not still among us pure and holy souls, who renew the fervour and faith of the primitive times, and who are living proofs of the possibility of the duties, and of the mercies of the Lord upon his people ? “ Tell us no longer then,” says the spirit of God, “ that the former days were better than these ; for thou dost not enquire wisely concerning this.” To follow Jesus Christ, sufferance must always be required : in all ages, it hath been necessary to bear his cross, not to conform to the corrupted age, and to live as strangers upon the earth: in all times, the holy have had the same passions as we to resist, the same abuses to shun, the same snares to dread, the same obstacles to surmount: and, if there be any difference here, it is, that, in former times, it was not merely arbitrary customs which they had to shun, nor the derisions of the world which they had only to dread, in declaring for Jesus Christ; it was the most cruel punishments to which they must expose themselves; it was the power of the Cæsars, and the rage of tyrants, which they must despise; it was superstitions, become respectable through their antiquity, countenanced by the laws of the empire, and by the consent of almost all the people, which they had to shake off: it was, in a word, the whole universe which they had to arm against themselves. But the faith of these pious men was stronger than punishments, than the tyrants, than the Cæsars, than the whole world, and our faith cannot hold out against the absurdity of customs, or the puerility of derision; and the gospel, which could formerly make martyrs, scarcely at present can it form a believer. The law of God is then immutable in its duration; always the same in all times and in all places; but it is likewise immutable in its extent, and the same for all stations and conditions: this is my second reflection.

PART II. The most essential character of the law of Jesus Christ, is that of uniting, under the same

same rules, the Jew and the Gentile, the Greek and the Barbarian, the great and the people, the prince and the subject; in it there is no longer exception of persons. The law of Moses, at least in its customs and in its ceremonies, was given only to a single people; but Jesus Christ is an universal Legislator; his law, as his death, is for all men. He came, of all people to make only one people; of all stations and of all conditions to form only one body: it is the same spirit which animates it, the same laws which govern it: different functions may there be exercised, different places, more or less honourable, be occupied; but it is the same spring which rules all the members of it. All these hateful distinctions, which formerly divided men, are destroyed by the church: that holy law knows neither poor nor rich; neither noble nor base born; neither master nor slave; it sees in men only the title of believer, which equals them all: it distinguishes them not by their names, or by their offices, but by their virtues; and the greatest in its sight are those who are the most holy.

Nevertheless, a second illusion, pretty common against the immutability of the law of God, is the persuasion that it changes and becomes mollified in favour of rank and of birth; that its obligations are less rigid for persons born to elevation; and that the obstacles, which high places and the manners attached to grandeur throw in the way of the observance of the strict duties of the gospel, and which render the practice of them almost impossible to the great, likewise render their transgression more innocent. They figure to themselves that the abuses, permitted, in all times, by custom to the great, are likewise accorded to them by the law of God, and that there is another path of salvation for them than for the people. Thence, all the laws of the church violated; the times and the days consecrated to abstinence, confounded with the rest of days, are looked upon as privileges refused to the vulgar, and reserved solely for rank and birth: thence, to live only for the senses, to be attentive only to satisfy them, to refuse nothing to taste, to vanity, to curiosity, to idleness, to ambition, to make a God of one's self; the same prosperity, which facilitates all these excesses, excuses and justifies them.

But, my brethren, I have already said it, the gospel is the law of all men: great, people, you have all promised, upon the sacred fonts, to observe it. The church, in receiving you into the number of her children, hath not proposed to the great other vows to make, and other rules to practise, than to the common people: you have all there made the same promises; all sworn, in the face of the altars, to observe the same gospel. The church hath not then demanded of you, if, by your birth according to the flesh, you were great, or of the common people; but if, by your regeneration

regeneration in Jesus Christ, you meant to be faithful, and to engage yourself to follow his law : upon the vow which you have made of it, she hath placed the holy gospel upon your head, in order to mark that you submitted yourself to that sacred yoke.

Now, my brethren, all the duties of the gospel are reduced to two points. Some are proposed in order to resist and to weaken that fund of corruption which we bear from our birth ; the others in order to perfect that first grace of the Christian which we have received in baptism ; that is to say, the one in order to destroy in us the old Adam ; the others in order to make Jesus Christ to grow there. Violence, self-denial, and mortification, regard the first : prayer, retirement, vigilance, contempt for the world, desire of invisible riches, are comprised in the second : behold the whole gospel. Now, I demand of you, what is there in these two descriptions of duties from which rank or birth can dispense you ?

Ought you to pray less than the other believers ? Have you fewer favours to ask than they, fewer obstacles to overcome, fewer snares to avoid, fewer desires to resist ? Alas ! the more you are exalted, the more do dangers augment, the more do occasions of sin spring up under your feet, the more is the world beloved, the more doth every thing favour your passions, the more doth every thing militate against your good desires ; is it in a situation

situation so terrible for salvation that you find privileges which render it more mild and more commodious. The more, therefore, that you are exalted, the more doth mortification become necessary to you; for, the more that pleasures corrupt your heart, the more is vigilance necessary, because the dangers are more frequent; the more ought faith to be lively, because every thing around you weakens and extinguishes it; the more ought prayer to be continual, because the grace, in order to support you, ought to be more powerful; humility of heart more heroical, because the attachments to things here below are more unavoidable: lastly, the more you are exalted, the more doth salvation become difficult to you; this is the only privilege you can expect from elevation. Also, thou often warnest us, great God, that thy kingdom is only for the poor and the lowly: thou speakest not of the difficulty of salvation for the great and the powerful, but in terms which would seem to deprive them of all hope of pretending to it, if we knew not that thou wishest the salvation of all men, and that thy grace is still more powerful for our sanctification, than prosperity for our corruption.

And surely, my brethren, if grandeur and elevation were to render our condition more fortunate and more favourable with regard to salvation, in vain would the doctrine of Jesus Christ teach us to dread grandeurs and human prosperities; in vain

vain would it be said to us : That blessed are they who weep, and who suffer here below ; that wo unto those who laugh now, for they shall mourn and weep ; and unto those who are rich, for they have received their consolation ; and that, to receive our reward in this world, through the transitory riches and honours which we there receive, is almost a certain sign that we are not to receive it in the other. On the contrary, grandeur and prosperity would become a state worthy of envy, even according to the rules of faith ; against the maxim of Jesus Christ, it would be necessary to call those happy who are immersed in pleasures and in opulence ; since, besides the comforts of a smiling fortune, they would likewise find there a way of salvation more mild and more easy than in an obscure state ; those who suffer, and who weep here below, would then be the most miserable of all men ; since, to all the bitternesses of their condition, would likewise be added those of a gospel, more rigorous and more austere for them than for the persons born in abundance. What new gospel would it then be necessary to announce to you, if such were the rules of the morality of Jesus Christ ?

But I say not even enough. Granting that prosperity should not exact more rigid precautions in consequence of the dangers which surround it, it would exact, at least, more rigorous reparations, through the crimes and excesses which are inseparable rable from it. Alas! my brethren, is it not among you that the passions no longer know any bounds; that the jealousies are more keen, the hatreds more lasting, revenge more honourable, evil-speaking more cruel, ambition more boundless, and voluptuousness more shameful? Is it not among the great that the most shocking debauchery even refines upon the common crimes; that dissipations become an art; and that, in order to prevent those disgusts inseparable from licentiousness, resources are sought in guilt against guilt itself? What indulgence then can you promise yourselves on the part of religion? If the most righteous be responsible for the whole law, should the greatest sinners be discharged from it? Measure your duties upon your crimes, and not upon your rank; judge of yourselves by the insults which you have offered to God, and not by the vain homages which are paid to you by men; number the days and the years of your crimes which shall be the eternal titles of your condemnation, and not the years and the ages of the antiquity of your race, which are only vain titles written upon the ashes of your tombs; examine what you owe to God, and not what men owe to you. If the world were to judge you, you might promise yourselves distinctions and preferences; but the world shall itself be judged; and he, who will judge it and you also, shall distinguish men only by their vices or by their virtues. He will not demand the names, he will demand only the deeds : calculate thereupon the distinctions which you ought to expect.

Thus, we see not that Jesus Christ, in the gospel, proposed to the princes of the people, and to the grandees of Jerusalem, other maxims than to the citizens of Judea, and to his disciples, all taken from the lowest ranks of the people ; he speaks in the capital of Judea, and before all that Palestine had the most illustrious, as he speaks upon the borders of the sea, or upon the mountains, to that obscure populace which followed him ; his maxims are not changed with the rank of those who listen to him. The cross, violence, contempt of the world, self-denial, abstinence from pleasures : behold what he announces at Jerusalem, the seat of kings, as at Nazareth, the most obscure place of Judea ; to that young man who was so rich, as to the children of Zebedee, whose only inheritance was their nets ; to the sisters of Lazarus, of a distinguished rank in Palestine, as to the woman of Samaria of a more obscure condition ; his enemies themselves confessed that this was his peculiar character, and were forced to render him this justice, that he taught the way of God in truth, and that he had no respect of rank or of persons.

What do I say ? Even after his death the gospel seemed a doctrine sent down from heaven, only because that, announcing to the great and to the powerful sorrowful and crucifying maxims, apparently rently so incompatible with their station, they, nevertheless, submitted to the yoke of Jesus Christ, and embraced a law which, amid all their prosperity and abundance, permitted to them no more pleasures and comforts here below, than to the common and simple people. And, in effect, why should the first defenders of faith have regarded the conversion of Cæsars, and of the powerful of the age, as a proof of the truth and of the divinity of the gospel? What would there be so surprising, that the rich and the powerful had embraced a doctrine which would distinguish them from the people by a greater indulgence; which, while it would prescribe tears, fasting, self-denial to others, would relax in favour of the great, and would consent that profusions, pleasures, sensualities, gaming, public places, all so rigorously forbidden to common believers, became an innocent occupation for them; and, that what is a road of perdition for others, should, for them alone, be a road of salvation? It would then be the wisdom of the age which would have established the gospel, and not the folly of the cross; it would be the artifices and the deferences of men, and not the arm of the Almighty; it would be flesh and blood, and not the power of God; and the conversion of the universe would have nothing more wonderful, than the establishment of superstitions and of sects.

And candidly, my brethren, if the gospel had distinctions to make, and condescensions to grant, if

if the law of God could relax something of its severity, would it be in favour of those who are born to rank and to abundance? What! It would preserve all its rigour for the poor and the unfortunate? It would condemn to tears, to fastings, to penitence, to poverty, those unfortunate souls whose days are mingled with almost nothing but sufferance and sorrow, and whose only comfort is that of eating with temperance the bread earned with the sweat of their brow? And it would discharge from these rigorous duties the grandees of the earth? And it would exact nothing painful of those whose days are only diversified by the variety of their pleasures? And it would reserve all its indulgence for those soft and voluptuous souls, who live only for the senses, who believe that they are upon the earth for the sole purpose of enjoying an iniquitous felicity, and who know no other god than themselves?

Great God! It is the blindness which thy justice sheds over human prosperities: after having corrupted the heart, they likewise extinguish all the lights of faith. It rarely happens but that the great, so enlightened upon the interests of the earth, upon the ways to fortune and to glory, upon the secret springs which give motion to courts and empires, live in a profound ignorance of the ways of salvation. They have been so much accustomed to preference by the world, that they are persuaded they ought likewise to find them in religion.

ligion. Because men do them credit for the smallest steps taken in their favour, they believe, O my God! that thou regardest them with the same eyes as men; and that, in fulfilling some weak duties of piety, in taking some small steps for thee, they go even beyond what they owe to thee: as if their smallest religious works acquired a new merit from their rank; in place of which, they acquire it, in thy sight, only from that faith and from that charity which animates them.

It is thus that the law of God, immutable in its extent, is the same for all stations, for the great and for the people. But it is likewise immutable in all the situations of life; and it is neither a difficult conjuncture, nor perplexity, nor apparent danger, nor pretext of public good, in which to violate, or even to soften it, becomes a legitimate and necessary modification: this was to have been my last reflection; but I abide and go on.

Yes, my brethren, every thing becomes reason and necessity against our duties, that is to say, against the law of God; situations the least dangerous, conjunctures the least embarrassing, furnish us with pretexts to violate it with safety, and persuade us that the law of God would be unjust, and would exact too much of men, if, on these occasions, it were not to use indulgence with regard to us.

Thus, the law of God commands us to render to each that which is his due, to retrench, in order

der to pay those debts incurred through our excesses, and not to permit that our unfortunate creditors suffer by our senseless profusions: nevertheless, the general persuasion is that, in a grand place, it is necessary to support the eclat of a public dignity; that the honour of the master requires that mean and sorry externals disgrace not the elevated post which he hath confided to us; that we are responsible to the sovereign, to the state, to ourselves, before being so to individuals: and that public propriety is then superior to the particular rule.

Thus, the law of God enjoins us to tear out the eye which giveth offence, and to cast it from us; to separate ourselves from an object which, in all times, hath been the rock of our innocence, and near to which we can never be in safety: nevertheless, the noise which a rupture would make, the suspicions which it might awaken in the public mind, the ties of society, of relationship, of friendship, which seem to render the separation impossible without eclat, persuade us that it is not then commanded, and that a danger, become as if necessary, becomes a security to us.

Thus, the law of God commands us to render glory to the truth; not to betray our conscience by iniquitously withholding it; that is to say, not to dissemble it, through human interests, from those to whom our duty obliges us to announce it: nevertheless, we persuade ourselves that truths, which

which would be unavailing, ought to be suppressed; and that a liberty, of which the only fruit would be that of risking our fortune, and of rendering ourselves hated, without rendering those better to whom we owe the truth, would rather be an indiscretion than a law of charity and of justice.

Thus, the law of God prescribes to us to have in view, in public cares, only the utility of the people, for whom alone the authority is entrusted to us; to consider ourselves as charged with the interests of the multitude, as the avengers of injustice, the refuge against oppression and poverty: nevertheless, we believe ourselves to be situated in conjunctures, in which it is necessary to shut our eyes upon iniquity, to support abuses which we know to be untenable, to sacrifice conscience and duty to the necessity of the times, and, without scruple, to violate the clearest rules, because the inconveniencies, which would arise from their observance, seem to render their transgression necessary. Lastly, Human pretexts, interests, and inconveniencies, always make the balance to turn to their side; and duty, and the law of God, always yield to conjunctures and to the necessity of the times.

Now, my brethren, I do not tell you, in the first place, that the interest of salvation is the greatest of all interests; that fortune, life, reputation, the whole world itself, put in comparison with your soul,

foul, ought to be reckoned as nothing; and that, though heaven and the earth should change, that the whole world should perish, and every evil burst upon our head, these inconveniencies would always be infinitely less than the transgression of the law of God.

Secondly, I do not tell you that the law hath always, at least, security in its favour against the pretext, because the obligation of the law is clear and precise, in place of which, the pretext, which introduces the exception, is always doubtful; and that, consequently, to prefer the pretext to the law, is to leave a safe way, and to make choice of another, for which no person can be answerable to you.

Lastly, I do not tell you that, the gospel having been only given to us in order to detach us from the world and from ourselves, and to make us die to all our terrestrial affections, it is deceiving ourselves to consider, as inconveniencies, certain consequences of that divine law, fatal either to our fortune, to our glory, or to our ease, and to persuade ourselves that it is then permitted to us to have recourse to expedients which mollify it, and conciliate its severity with the interests of our self-love. Jesus Christ hath never meant to prescribe to us easy and commodious duties, and which take nothing from the passions; he came to bring the sword and separation to hearts, to divide man from his relations, from his friends, from himself; to hold out to us a way rugged and difficult to keep.

Thus,

Thus, what we call inconveniencies and unheard-of extremities, are, at bottom, only the spirit of the law, the most natural consequences of the rules, and the end that Jesus Christ had intended in prescribing them to us.

That young man of the gospel regarded as an inconveniency, the being unable to go to pay the last duties to his father, and to gather in what he had succeeded to, if he followed Jesus Christ: and it was precisely that sacrifice which Jesus Christ exacted of him. Those men invited to the feast looked upon as an inconveniency, the one to forsake his country-house, the other his trade, the last to delay his marriage; and it was in order to break afunder all these ties, which bound them still too much to the earth, that the father of the family invited them to come and seat themselves at the feast. Esther, at first, considered as an inconveniency to go to appear before Ahasuerus, contrary to the law of the empire, and to declare herself a daughter of Abraham, and protectress of the children of Israel; and, nevertheless, as the wife Mordecai represented to her, the Lord had raised her to that point of glory and prosperity only for that important occasion. Whatever is a constraint to us, appears a reason against the law; and we take for inconveniencies the obligations themselves.

Besides, my brethren, is it not certain that the principal merit of our duties is derived from the obstacles which never fail to oppose their practice; that the most essential character of the law of Jesus Christ is that of exciting against it all the reasons of flesh and blood; and virtue would resemble vice, if outwardly and inwardly it found in us only facilities and conveniencies? The righteous, my brethren, have never been peaceable observers of the holy rules: Abel found inconveniencies in the jealousy of his own brother; Noah in the unbelief of his own citizens; Abraham in the disputes of his servants; Joseph in the dangers to which he was exposed through his love of modesty and the rage of a faithless woman; Daniel in the customs of a profane court; the pious Esdras in the manners of his age; the noble Eleazar in the snares of a specious temperament: lastly, follow the history of the just, and you will see that, in all ages, all those who have walked in the precepts and in the ordinances of the law, have experienced inconveniencies, in which righteousness itself seemed to authorize the transgression of the rules; have encountered obstacles in their way, where the lights of an human reason seemed to decide in favour of the pretext against the law; in a word, where virtue seemed to condemn virtue itself: and that, consequently, it is not new for the law of God to meet with obstacles; but that it is new to pretend to find in these obstacles legitimate excuses for dispensing ourselves from the law of God.

And the decisive argument which confirms this truth is, that our passions alone form the inconveniencies

niencies which authorise us in seeking mollifications to our duties and to the law of God; and that views of fortune, of glory, of favour, engage us in certain proceedings, justify them in our eyes, in spite of the evidence of rules which condemn them, only because we love our glory and our fortune more than the rules themselves.

Let us die to the world and to ourselves, my brethren; let us restore to our heart the sentiments of love and of preference, which it owes to its Lord: then every thing shall appear possible; difficulties shall, in an instant, be done away; and what we call inconveniencies either shall no longer be reckoned as any thing, or we shall consider them as inseparable proofs of virtue, and not as the excuses of vice. How easy it is to find pretexts when we love them! Arguments are never wanting to the passions. Self-love is always ready in placing, at least, appearances on its side; it always changes our weaknesses into duties, and our inclinations soon become legitimate claims; and what in this is most deplorable, says St Augustin, is that we call in even religion itself in aid of our passions; that we draw motives from piety, in order to violate piety itself; and that we have recourse to holy pretexts to authorise iniquitous desires.

It is thus, O my God! that almost our whole life is passed in seducing ourselves; that we employ the lights of our reason only in darkening those of faith; that we consume the few days we have to pass pass upon the earth only in seeking authorities for our passions, in imagining situations in which we believe ourselves to be enabled to disobey thee with impunity; that is to say, that all our cares, all our reflections, all the superiority of our views, of our lights, of our talents, all the wisdom of our measures and of our counsels, are limited to the accomplishment of our ruin, and to conceal from ourselves our eternal destruction.

Let us shun this evil, my brethren; let us reckon no way safe for us but that of the rules and of the law; and let us remember that there shall be more sinners condemned through the pretexts which seem to authorize the transgressions of the law, than through the avowed crimes which violate it. It is thus that the law of God, after having been the rule of our manners upon the earth, shall be their eternal consolation in heaven.

SERMON V.

FOR CHRISTMAS DAY.

LUKE ii. 10.

For, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people; for unto you is born, this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

BEHOLD, in effect, the grand tidings which, for four thousand years, the world had expected; behold the grand event which so many prophets had foretold; so many ceremonies had figured; so many righteous had awaited, and which all nature seemed to promise, and to hasten by the universal corruption spread through all flesh; behold the grand blessing which God's goodness prepared for men, after the infidelity of their first parent had rendered them all subject to sin and death.

The

The Saviour, the Christ, the Lord, at last appears this day on the earth. The over-shadowed bring forth the righteous; the star of Jacob appears to the universe; the sceptre is departed from Judah, and he, who was to come, is arrived; the age of darkness is accomplished; the promised sign of the Lord to Judea hath appeared; a virgin has conceived and brought forth, and out of Bethlehem comes the leader who is to enlighten and govern all Israel.

What new blessings, my brethren, doth this birth not announce to men? It would not, during so many ages, have been announced, awaited, desired; it would not have formed the religion of a whole people, the object of all the prophecies; the unravelling of all the figures, the sole end of all the proceedings of God towards men, had it not been the grandest mark of his love which he could give them. What a blessed night is that which presides at this divine bringing-forth! It hath seen the light of the world shine forth in its darkness; the heavens resound with joy and songs of thanksgiving.

But, my brethren, we must participate in the blessings which this birth is meant to bring us, in order to enter into all the transports of delight which it spreads through the heavens and the earth. The common joy is founded only on the common salvation which is offered to us; and if, in spite of this aid, we still obstinately persist in perishing,

perishing, the church weeps over us, and we mingle mourning and sorrow with that joy with which such blessed tidings inspire it.

Now, what are the inestimable blessings which this birth brings to men? The heavenly spirits come themselves to make it known to the shepherds; it comes to render glory to God, and peace to men; and behold the whole foundation of this grand mystery laid open. To God, that glory of which men had wished to deprive him; to men, that peace of which they had never ceased their struggles to deprive themselves.

PART I. Man had been placed upon the earth for the sole purpose of rendering, to the author of his being, that glory and that homage which were his due. All called him to these duties; and every thing, which ought to have called, removed him from them. To his supreme Majesty he owed his adoration and his homage; to his paternal goodness his love; to his infinite wisdom, the sacrifice of his reason and of his lights. These duties, engraven on his heart, and born with him, were still also incessantly proclaimed to him by all creatures; he could neither listen to himself, nor to all things around him, without finding them; nevertheless, he forgets, he effaces them from his heart. He no longer saw in the work, that honour and that worship which were due to the sovereign Architect; in the blessings with which he loaded him, that love which he owed to his benefactor; factor; in the obscurity spread through even natural causes, that impossibility, much less, of fathoming the secrecies of God, and that mistrust, in which he ought to live, of his own lights. Idolatry, therefore, rendered to the creature that worship which the Creator had reserved for himself alone: the synagogue honoured him from the lips, and that love, which it owed to him, was confined to external homages totally unworthy of him: philosophy lost itself in its own ideas, measured the lights of God by those of men, and vainly believed that reason, which knew not itself, was able to know all truth: three fores, spread over the face of the whole earth. In a word, God was no longer either known or glorified, and man was no longer known to himself.

And, Isly, To what excesses had idolatry not carried its profane worship? The death of a person loved, quickly exalted him to a divinity; and his vile ashes, on which his nothingness was stamped in characters so indelible, became themselves the title of his glory and of his immortality. Conjugal love made gods to itself; impure love followed the example, and determined to have its altars: the wife and the mistress, the husband and the lover, had temples, priests, and sacrifices. The folly, or the general corruption, adopted a worship so ridiculous and so abominable; the whole universe was infected with it; the majesty of the laws of the empire authorised it; and the magnificence of the

the

the temples, the pomp of the sacrifices, the immense riches of the images, rendered that folly respectable. Every people was jealous in having its gods; in default of man they offered incense to the beast; impure homages became the worship of these impure divinities; the towns, the mountains, the fields, the deserts, were stained with them, and beheld superb edifices consecrated to pride, to lasciviousness, to revenge. The number of the divinities equalled that of the passions; the gods were almost as numerous as the men; all became god with man; and the true God was the only one unknown to man.

The world was plunged, almost from its creation, in the horror of this darkness; every age had added to it fresh impieties. In proportion as the appointed time of the Deliverer drew near, the depravity of men seemed to increase. Rome itself, mistress of the universe, gave way to all the different worships of the nations she had subjugated; and beheld exalted, within her walls, the different idols of so many conquered countries, that they became the public monuments of her folly and blindness, rather than of her victories.

But, after all, though all flesh had corrupted his way, God no longer wished to pour out his wrath upon men, nor to exterminate them by a fresh deluge; he wished to save them. He had placed in the heavens the sign of his covenant with the world; and that sign was not the shining, though vulgar rainbow which appears in the clouds ; it was Jesus Christ his only Son, the Word made flesh, the true seal of the eternal covenant, and the sole light which comes to enlighten the whole world.

He appears on the earth, and restores to his Father that glory of which the impiety of a public worship had wished to deprive him. The homage rendered to him, by his holy soul united to the world, at once makes amends to his supreme Majesty for all the honours which the universe had hitherto denied him, in order to prostitute them to a creature. A Man-God adorer renders more glory to the divinity than all idolatrous ages and nations had deprived him of ; and such homage must indeed have been agreeable to the sovereign God, seeing it alone effaced idolatry from the earth ; made the blood of impure victims cease to flow ; overturned the profane altars ; silenced the oracles of demons ; reduced to dust the vain idols, and changed their superb temples, till then the receptacle of every abomination, into houses of adoration and prayer. Thus was the universe changed : the only God, unknown even in Athens, and in those cities most celebrated for knowledge and polished manners, was worshipped : the world acknowledged its Author : God entered into his rights ; a worship worthy of him was established over the whole earth ; and he had every where adorers, who worshipped him in spirit and in truth.

Behold

Behold the first blessing accruing from the birth of Jesus Christ, and the first glory which he renders to his Father. But, my brethren, is this grand blessing for us? We no longer worship vain idols; an incestuous Jupiter, a lascivious Venus, a cruel and revengeful Mars; but is God, therefore, more glorified among us? In their place do we not substitute fortune, voluptuousness, court favour, the world, with all its pleasures? For, whatever we love more than God, that we worship; whatever we prefer to God, that becomes our god; whatever becomes the sole object of our thoughts, of our desires, of our affections, of our fears and hopes, becomes likewise the object of our worship; and our gods are our passions, to which we sacrifice the true God.

Now, what idols of this kind still remain in the Christian world! You, that unfortunate creature, to whom you have prostituted your heart; to whom you sacrifice your wealth, your fortune, your glory, your peace; and from whom neither religious motives nor even those of the world can detach you, that is your idol: and what less is she than your divinity, since, in your madness, you do not refuse her even the name? You that court that fortune which engrosses you, to which you devote all your cares, all your exertions, all your movements, in short, your whole soul, mind, will, and life, that is your idol; and what criminal homage do you refuse from the moment that it is exacted of you, and that it may become the price of its favour? You, that shameful intemperance, which debases your name and birth; which no longer accords even with our manners; which has drowned and befotted all your talents in the excesses of wine and debauchery; which, by rendering you callous to every thing else, leaves you neither relish nor feeling but for the brutal pleasures of the table, that is your idol: you think that you live only in those moments given to it; and your heart renders more homage to that infamous and abject god than your despicable and profane songs. The passions formerly made the gods; and Jesus Christ hath destroyed these idols only by destroying the passions which had raised them up: you exalt them again, by reviving all the passions which had rendered the whole world idolatrous. And what matters it to know a single god, if you elsewhere bestow your homages? Worship is in the heart; and if the true God be not the God of your heart, you place, like the pagans, vile creatures in his place, and you render not to him that glory which is his due.

of

Thus Jesus Christ doth not confine himself to manifesting the name of his Father to men, and to establishing, on the ruins of idols, the knowledge of the true God. He raiseth up worshippers, who reckon external homages as nothing, unless animated and sanctified by love; and who shall consider mercy, justice, and holiness, as the offerings
most

most worthy of God, and the most shining attendants of their worship: second blessing from the birth of Jesus Christ, and second sort of glory which he renders to his Father.

In effect, God was known, says the prophet, in Judea; Jerufalem beheld no idols in the public places, usurping the homages due to the God of Abraham; “there was neither iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel:” that single portion of the earth was free from the general contagion. But the magnificence of its temple, the pomp of its sacrifices, the splendour of its solemnities, the exactitude of its lawful observances, constituted the whole merit of its worship; all religion was confined to these external duties. Its morals were not less criminal: Injustice, fraud, falsehood, adultery, every vice subsisted, and were even countenanced by these vain appearances of worship: God was honoured from the lips; but the heart of that ungrateful people was ever distant from him.

Jesus Christ comes to open the eyes of Judea on an error so gross, so ancient, and so injurious to his Father. He comes to inform them, that man may be satisfied with externals alone, but that God regards only the heart; that every outward homage which withholds it from him, is an insult and an hypocrisy, rather than a true worship; that it matters little to purify the external, if the internal be full of infection and putrefaction; and

and that God is truly worshipped only by loving him.

But, alas! my brethren, is this mistake, so wretched and so often reproached to the synagogue by Jesus Christ, not still the error of the majority of us? To what, in fact, is the whole of our worship reduced? To some external ceremonies; to fulfilling certain public duties prescribed by the law; and even this is the religion of the most respectable. They come to assist in the holy mysteries; they do not, without scruple, depart from the laws of the church; they repeat some prayers which custom has consecrated; they go through the solemnities, and increase the crowd which runs to our temples: behold the whole. But are they, in consequence, more detached from the world, and from its criminal pleasures? Less occupied with the cares of a vain dress, or of fortune? More inclined to break off a criminal engagement, or to fly opportunities which have so often been a rock to their innocence? Do they bring to these external practices of religion, a pure heart, a lively faith, a guileless charity? All their passions submit amid all these religious works, which are given to custom rather than to religion.

And remark, I pray you, my brethren, that they would not dare to dispense themselves altogether from them; to live, like impious, without any profession of worship, and without fulfilling at least some of its public duties: They would consider themselves themselves as anathematized, and worthy of the thunder of heaven. And yet they dare to fully these holy duties by the most criminal manners! And yet they do not view themselves with horror, while rendering useless these superficial remains of religion, by a life which religion condemns and abhors! And they dread not the wrath of God, in continuing crimes which attract it on our heads, and in limiting all that is his due to vain homages which insult him!

Nevertheless, as I have already said, of all the worldly these are the most prudent, and, in the eyes of the world, the most regular. They have not yet thrown off the yoke, like so many others; they do not arrogate to themselves a shocking glory in not believing in God; they blaspheme not what they do not know; they do not consider religion as a mockery and a human invention; they still wish to hold to it by some externals; but they hold not to it by the heart; but they dishonour it by their irregularities; but they are not Christians but in name. Thus, even in a greater degree than formerly under the synagogue, the magnificent externals of religion subsist among us, along with a more profound and more general depravity of manners than ever the prophets reproached to the obstinacy and hypocrisy of the Jews: thus, that religion, in which we glory, is no longer, to the greatest number of believers, but a superficial worship: thus, that new covenant, which ought to be written

written only in the heart ; that law of spirit and life, which ought to render men wholly spiritual ; that inward worship, which ought to have given to God worshippers in spirit and in truth, has given him only phantoms, only fictitious adorers ; the mere appearances of worship ; in a word, but a people still Jewish, which honours him from the lips, but whose corrupted heart, stained with a thousand crimes, chained by a thousand iniquitous passions, is always far distant from him.

Behold the second blessing, of the birth of Jesus Christ, in which we have no part. He comes to abolish a worship wholly external, which was confined to sacrifices of animals and lawful ceremonies, and which, in not rendering to God the homage of our love, alone capable of glorifying him, rendered not to him that glory which is his due : in place of these appearances of religion, he comes to substitute a law which ought to be fulfilled wholly in the heart ; a worship, of which the love of his Father ought to be the first and the principal homage. Nevertheless, this holy worship, this new precept, this sacred trust, which he hath confided to us, has miserably degenerated in our hands ; we have turned it into a worship wholly Pharisaical, in which the heart has no part ; which has no influence in changing our irregular propensities ; which has no effect upon our manners, and which only renders us so much the more criminal, criminal, as we abuse the blessing which ought to wash out and purify all our crimes.

Lastly, Men had likewise wished to ravish from God the glory of his providence and of his eternal wisdom. Philosophers, struck with the absurdity of a worship which multiplied gods to infinity, and forced, by the sole lights of reason, to acknowledge one sole Supreme Being, disfigured the nature of that Being by a thousand absurd opinions. Some figured to themselves an indolent god; retired within himself; in full possession of his own happiness; disdainng to abase himself by paying attention to what passes on the earth; reckoning as nothing men whom he had created; equally insensible to their virtues as to their vices; and leaving wholly to chance the course of ages and seasons, the revolutions of empires, the lot of each individual, the whole machine of this vast universe, and the whole dispensation of human things. Others subjected him to a fatal chain of events; they made him a god without liberty and without power; and, while they regarded him as the master of men, they believed him to be the slave of destiny. The errors of reason were then the only rule of religion, and of the belief of those who were considered as even the wisest and most enlightened.

Jesus Christ comes to restore to his Father that glory of which the vain reasonings of philosophy had deprived him. He comes to teach to men that faith is the source of true lights; and that the sacrifice of reason is the first step of Christian philosophy. He comes to fix uncertainty, by instructing us in what we ought to know of the supreme Being, and what, with regard to him, we ought not to know.

It was not, in effect, sufficient that men, in order to render glory to God, should make a sacrifice to him of their life, as to the author of their being, and should, by that avowal, acknowledge the impiety of idolatry; that they should make a sacrifice to him of their love and of their heart, as to their sovereign felicity, and thereby proclaim the insufficiency and the inutility of the external and pharisaical worship of the synagogue; it was likewise required, that to him they should sacrifice their reason, as to their wisdom and to their eternal truth, and thus be undeceived with regard to the vain researches and the conceited knowledge of philosophers.

Now, the sole birth of a Man-God, the ineffable union of our nature with a divine person, disconcerts all human reason; and this incomprehensible mystery, held out to men as their whole knowledge, their whole truth, their whole philosophy, their whole religion, at once makes them feel, that the truth, which they hitherto had in vain sought, must be sought, not by vain efforts, but by the sacrifice of reason and of our feeble lights.

But,

But, alas ! where among us are believers who make a thorough sacrifice of their reason to faith ; and who, rejecting their own lights, humble their eyes, in a respectful and silent adoration, before the majestic impenetrability of religion ? I speak not of those impious, still to be found among us, who deny a God. Ah ! we must leave them to the horror and the indignation of the whole universe which knows a divinity, and which worships him ; or rather leave them to the horror of their own conscience, which inwardly invokes and calls upon him in spite of themselves, while outwardly they are glorifying themselves in professing not to know him.

I speak of the majority of believers, who have an idea of the divinity, almost equally false and equally human, as had formerly the pagan philosophers ; who consider him as nothing in all the accidents of life ; who live as if chance or the caprice of men determined all things here below ; and who acknowledge good-luck and bad-luck as the two sole divinities which govern the world, and which preside over every thing relative to the earth. I speak of those men of little faith who, far from adoring the secrecies of futurity in the profound and impenetrable councils of providence, go to search for them in ridiculous and childish prophecies ; attribute to man a knowledge which God hath solely reserved to himself ; with a senseless belief await, from the dreams of a false prophet, phet, events and revolutions which are to decide the destiny of nations and empires : found thereupon vain hopes for themselves, and renew either the folly of pagan augurs and soothsayers, or the impiety of the pythoness of Saul, and of the oracles of Delphi and Dodona. I speak of those who wish to penetrate into the eternal ways of God on our lots ; and who, being unable, by the sole powers of reason, to solve the insurmountable difficulties of the mysteries of grace with regard to the salvation of men, far from crying out with the apostle, “ O the depth of the riches both of the “ wisdom and knowledge of God !” are tempted to believe, either that God doth not interfere in our salvation ; or, if he do, that it is needless for us to interfere in it ourselves. I speak of those dissolute characters in the world, who always find plausible and convincing, though, in fact, weak and foolish in the extreme, whatever unbelief opposes to faith ; who are staggered by the first frivolous doubt proposed by the impious ; who appear as if they would be delighted that religion were false ; and who are less touched with that respectable load of proofs which overpower a conceited reason and its truth, than with a senseless discourse which opposes it, in which there is generally nothing important but the boldness of the impiety and of the blasphemy. Lastly, I speak of many believers who turn over to the people the belief of so many wonderful actions which the history

tory

tory of religion has preserved to us ; who seem to believe that, whatever is above the power of man, is likewise beyond the power of God ; and who refuse credit to the miracles of a religion which is solely founded on them, and which is itself the greatest of all miracles.

Behold how we still snatched from God that glory which the birth of Jesus Christ had rendered to him. It had taught us to sacrifice our own lights to the incomprehensible mystery of his manifestation in our flesh, and no longer to live but by faith ; it had fixed the uncertainties of the human mind, and recalled it from the errors and the abyss in which reason had plunged it, to the way of truth and life, and we abandon it : and even under the empire of faith, we wish still to walk as formerly, under the standards, if I may venture to speak in this manner, of a weak reason : the mysteries of religion, which we cannot comprehend, shock us ; we suspect, we reform all ; we would have God to think like man. Without altogether losing our faith, we suffer it to be inwardly weakened ; we allow it to remain inactive : and it is this relaxation of faith which has corrupted our manners ; multiplied vices ; enflamed all hearts with a love of things present ; extinguished the love of riches to come ; placed trouble, hatred, and dissention among believers, and effaced those original marks of innocence, of sanctity, and of charity, which at first had rendered Christianity so respectable even to those who refused submission to it. But not only doth the birth of Jesus Christ restore to God that glory of which men had wished to deprive him ; it likewise restores to men that peace, of which they had never ceased to deprive themselves : “ And on earth peace, good will towards men.”

PART II. An universal peace reigned throughout the universe when Jesus Christ, the “ Prince of Peace,” appeared on the earth : all the nations subject to the Roman empire peaceably supported the yoke of those haughty masters of the world : Rome herself, after civil dissensions, which had almost depopulated her walls, filled the islands and deserts with her proscribed, and bathed Europe and Asia with the blood of her citizens, breathed from the horror of these troubles, and reunited under the authority of a Cesar, experienced, in slavery, a peace which she had never, during the enjoyment of her liberty, been able to accomplish.

The universe was then at rest ; but that was but a deceitful calm. Man, the prey of his own violent and iniquitous passions, experienced within himself the most cruel dissention and war : far from God, delivered up to the agitations and frenzies of his own heart ; combatted by the multiplicity and the eternal contrariety of his irregular propensities, he was unable to find peace, because he never sought it but in the source of all his troubles and disquiets. Philosophers made a boast of being able to bestow it on their followers ; but that universal versal calm of the passions which they gave hopes of to their rage, and which they so emphatically announced, might suppress their fallies; but it left the whole venom in the heart. It was a peace of pride and ostentation; it masked the outward man; but, under that mask of ceremony, man always knew himself to be the same.

Jesus Christ comes to-day upon the earth, to bring that true peace to men which the world had never hitherto been able to give them. He comes radically to cure the evil; his divine philosophy is not confined to the promulgation of pompous precepts, which might be agreeable to reason, but which cured not the wounds of the heart; and, as pride, voluptuousness, hatred, and revenge, had been the fatal sources of all the agitations experienced by the heart of man, he comes to restore peace to him, by draining them off, through his grace, his doctrine, and his example.

Yes, my brethren, I say that pride had been the original source of all the troubles which tore the heart of men. What wars, what frenzies, had that fatal passion not lighted upon the earth? With what torrents of blood had it not inundated the universe? And what is the history of nations and of empires, of princes and of conquerors, of every age and people, but the history of those calamities with which pride from the beginning had afflicted men? The entire world was but a gloomy theatre, upon which that haughty and senseless passion every every day exhibited the most bloody scenes. But the external operations were but a faint image of the troubles which the proud man inwardly experienced. Ambition was a virtue : moderation was looked up as meanness : an individual overthrew his country, overturned the laws and customs, rendered millions miserable, in order to usurp the first place among his fellow-citizens; and the success of his guilt ensured him every homage; and his name, stained with the blood of his brethren, acquired only additional lustre in the public annals which preserved its memory; and a prosperous villain became the grandest character of his age. That passion, descending among the crowd, became less striking; but it was neither less animated nor furious: the obscure was not more at his ease than the public man: each wished to carry off the prize from his equals: the orator, the philosopher, wrangled for, and tore from each other that glory, which, in fact, was the sole end of all their toils and watchings; and, as the desires of pride are insatiable, man, to whom it was then honourable totally to yield himself up to it, being unable to rest in any degree of elevation, was likewise incapable of peace and tranquility. Pride, become the sole source of human honour and glory, was likewise become the fatal rock of the quiet and happiness of men.

The birth of Jesus Christ, by correcting the world of this error, re-establishes on the earth that peace

peace which pride had banished from it. He might have manifested himself to men, with all the marks of splendour which the prophets attributed to him: He might have assumed the pompous titles of conqueror of Judah, of legislator of the people, of deliverer of Israel; Jerusalem, in these glorious marks, would have recognised him whom she awaited: but Jerusalem, in these titles, saw only a human glory; and Jesus Christ comes to undeceive, and to teach her, that such glory is nothing; that such an expectation had been unworthy of the oracles of so many prophets who had announced him; that the Holy Spirit, which inspired them, could hold out only holiness and eternal riches to men; that all other riches, far from rendering them happy, only increased their evils and crimes; and that his visible ministry was to correspond with the splendid promises, which had, for so many ages, announced him, only by being wholly spiritual, and that he should intend only the salvation of men.

Thus, he is born at Bethlehem, in a poor and abject state; without external state or splendour, he whose birth the songs of all the armies of heaven then celebrated; without title which might distinguish him in the eyes of men, he who was exalted above all principality or power: he suffers his name to be written down among those of the obscurest subjects of Cesar; he whose name was above all other name, and who alone had the right of writing down the names of his chosen in the book of eternity : vulgar and simple shepherds alone came to pay him homage ; he, before whom whatever is mighty on the earth, in heaven, and in hell, ought to bend the knee : lastly, whatever can confound human pride is assembled at the spectacle of his birth. If titles, rank, or prosperity had been able to render us happy here below, and to shed peace through our heart, Jesus Christ would have made his appearance clothed in them, and would have brought all these riches to his disciples ; but he brings peace to us only by holding them in contempt, and by teaching us to hold them equally in contempt : he comes to render us happy, only by coming to suppress desires which hitherto had occasioned all our disquiets : he comes to point out to us more solid and more durable riches, alone capable of calming our hearts, of filling our desires, of easing our troubles : riches of which man cannot deprive us, and which require only to be loved and to be wished for, to be assured of possessing them.

Nevertheless, who tastes of this blessed peace ? Wars, troubles, frenzies, are they more rare since his birth ? Are those empires and states which worship him, in consequence more peaceful ? Does that pride which he came to destroy occasion less commotion and confusion among men ? Alas ! Seek among Christians that peace which ought to be their inheritance, and where shall you find it ? In cities ?

cities? Pride sets every thing there in motion; every one wishes to soar above the rank of his ancestors: an individual, exalted by fortune, destroys the happiness of thousands who walk in his steps, without being able to attain the same point of prosperity. In the circle of domestic walls? They conceal only distresses and cares: and the father of the family, solely occupied with the advancement rather than the Christian education of his offspring, leaves to them, for inheritance, his agitations and disquiets, which they, in their turn, shall one day transmit to their descendants. In the palaces of kings? But, there it is that a lawless and boundless ambition gnaws, devours every heart; it is there that, under the specious mask of joy and tranquility, the most violent and the bitterest passions are nourished; it is there that happiness apparently resides, and yet where pride occasions the greatest number of discontented and miserable. In the sanctuary? Alas! there, ought surely to be found an asylum of peace; but ambition pervades even the holy place; the efforts there are more to raise themselves above their brethren, than to render themselves useful to them; the holy dignities of the church become, like those of the age, the reward of intrigue and caballing; the religious circumspection of the prince cannot put a stop to solicitations and private intrigues; we there see the same inveteracy in rivalships, the same sorrow in consequence of neglect, the same jealousy jealousy towards those who are preferred to us : a ministry is boldly canvassed for, which ought to be accepted only with fear and trembling : they seat themselves in the temple of God, though placed there by other hands than his : they head the flock without his consent to whom it belongs, and without his having said, as to Peter, " Feed my sheep ;" and, as they have taken the charge without call and without ability, the flock are led without edification and without fruit, alas ! and often with shame. O peace of Jesus Christ ! which surpassest all sense, sole remedy against the troubles which pride incessantly excites in our hearts, who shall then be able to give thee to man ?

But, secondly, if the disquiets of pride had banished peace from the earth, the impure desires of the flesh had not given rise to fewer troubles. Man forgetting the excellency of his nature, and the sanctity of his origin, gave himself up, like the beasts, without scruple, to the impetuosity of that brutal instinct. Finding it the most violent and the most universal of his propensities, he believed it to be also the most innocent and the most lawful. In order still more to authorize it, he made it part of his worship, and formed to himself impure gods, in whose temples that infamous vice became the only homage which did honour to their altars : even a philosopher, in other respects the wisest of pagans, dreading that marriage should put a kind of check on that deplorable passion, had had wished to abolish that sacred bond ; to permit among men, as among animals, a brutal confusion, and only multiply the human race through crimes. The more that vice became general, the more it lost the name of vice ; and, nevertheless, what a deluge of miseries had it not poured out upon the earth ? With what fury had it not been seen to arm people against people ; kings against kings ; blood against blood ; brethren against brethren ; every where carrying trouble and carnage, and shaking the whole universe ? Ruins of cities, wrecks of the most flourishing empires, sceptres and crowns overthrown, became the public and gloomy monuments which every age reared up, in order, it would seem, to preserve, to following ages, the remembrance and the fatal tradition of those calamities with which that vice had afflicted the human race. It became itself an inexhaustible source of troubles and anxieties to the man who then gave himself up to a boundless gratification of it ; it held out peace and pleasure ; but jealousy, excess, frenzy, disgust, inconstancy, and black chagrin, continually walked in its steps : till then, that the laws, the religion, and the common example authorising it, the sole love of ease, even in these ages of darkness and corruption, kept free from it a small number of sages.

But that motive was too feeble to check its impetuous course, and to extinguish its fires in the heart of men : a more powerful remedy was required :

quired: and that is, the birth of the Deliverer, who comes to draw men out of that abyfs of corruption, in order to render them pure and without stain; to break afunder thofe shameful bonds, and to give peace to their hearts, by reftoring to them that freedom and innocence of which the flavery and tyranny of that vice had deprived them. He is born of a virgin-mother, and the pureft of all created beings: he thereby gives eftimation and honour to a virtue unknown to the world, and which even his people confidered as a reproach. Befides, in uniting himfelf with us, he becomes our head; incorporates us with himfelf; makes us to become members of his myftical body; of that body which no longer receives life and influence but from him; of that body whose every miniftry is holy; which is to be feated at the right hand of the living God, and to glorify him for ever.

Behold, my brethren, to what height of honour Jefus Chrift, in this myftery, exalts our flefh; he makes of it the temple of God; the fanctuary of the Holy Spirit; the portion of a body in which the fullnefs of the divinity refides; the object of the kindnefs and the love of his Father. But do we not ftill prophane this holy temple? Do we not ftill turn to fhame the members of Jefus Chrift? Do we, in a higher degree, refpect our flefh, fince it is become a holy portion of his myftical body? Does that shameful paffion not ftill exercife the same tyranny over Christians, that is to say, over the children of sanctity and liberty? Does it not still disturb the peace of the universe, the tranquility of empires, the harmony of families, the order of society, the confidence of marriage, the innocence of social intercourse, the lot of every individual? Are not the most tragical spectacles still every day furnished to the world by it? Does it respect the most sacred ties and the most respectable character? Does it not reckon as nothing every duty? Does it pay attention even to decency? And does it not turn all society into a frightful confusion, where custom has effaced every rule? Even you, who listen to me, from whence have arisen all the miseries and unhappineffes of your life, is it not from that deplorable passion? Is it not that which has overturned your fortune; which has cast trouble and dissention through the heart of your family; which has swallowed up the patrimony of your fathers; which has dishonoured your name; which has ruined your health, and now makes you to drag on a gloomy and disgraceful life on the earth? Is it not, at least, that which actually rends your heart, at present filled with it? What goes on within you but a tumultuous revolution of fears, desires, jealousies, mistrusts, disgusts, and frenzies? And since that passion has stained your soul, have you enjoyed a single moment of peace? Let Jesus Christ again be born within your heart; he alone can be your true peace: chase from it the impure spirits spirits, and the mansion of your soul will be at rest : become once more a child of grace ; innocence is the only source of tranquility.
fame

Lastly, the birth of Jesus Christ reconciles men to his Father ; it reunites the Gentile and the Jew ; it destroys all those hateful distinctions of Greek and Barbarian, of Roman and Scythian ; it extinguishes all animosities and hatreds ; of all nations it makes only one people ; of all his disciples, only one heart and one soul ; last kind of peace which it brings to men. Formerly they were united together, neither by worship, a common hope, nor by the new covenant, which, in an enemy, holds out to us a friend. They considered each other almost as creatures of a different species : the diversity of religions, of manners, of countries, of languages, of interests, had, it would appear, as if diversified in them the same nature : scarcely did they recognise each other by that figure of humanity, which was the only sign of connection still remaining to them. Like wild beasts, they mutually exterminated each other ; they centered their glory in depopulating the lands of their fellow-creatures, and in carrying in triumph their bloody heads as the splendid memorials of their victories : it might have been said that they held their existence from different irreconcilable creators, always watchful to destroy each other, and who had placed them here below only to revenge their quarrel, and to terminate their disagreement by the general extinction extinction of one of the two parties ; every disunited man, and nothing bound them together but interest and the passions, which were themselves the sole source of their divisions and animosities.

But Jesus Christ is become our peace, our reconciliation, the corner-stone which binds and unites the whole fabric, the living head which unites all his members, and makes but one body of the whole. Every thing knits us to him ; and whatever knits us to him unites us to each other. It is the same Spirit which animates us, the same hope which sustains us, the same bosom which brings us forth, the same fold which assembles us, and the same Shepherd who conducts us ; we are children of the same Father, inheritors of the same promises, citizens of the same eternal city, and members of one same body.

Now, my brethren, have so many sacred ties been successful in binding us together ? Christianity, which ought to be but the union of hearts, the tie to knit believers to each other, and Jesus Christ to believers ; and which ought to represent upon the earth an image of the peace of heaven ; Christianity itself is no longer but a horrible theatre of troubles and dissensions : war and fury seem to have established an eternal abode among Christians ; religion itself, which ought to unite, divides them. The unbeliever, the enemy of Jesus Christ, the children of the false prophet, who came to spread war and devastation through men, are in peace ; and the children of peace, and disciples of him who, this day, comes to bring it to men, have their hands continually armed with fire and sword against each other ! Kings rise up against kings ; nations against nations ; the seas which separate reunite them for their mutual destruction : a vile morsel of stone arms their fury and revenge ; and whole nations go to perish and to bury themselves under its walls, in contesting to whom shall belong its ruins : the earth is not sufficiently vast to contain them, and to fix them, each one in the bounds which nature herself seems to have pointed out for states and empires ; each wishes to usurp from his neighbour ; and a miserable field of battle, which is scarcely sufficient to serve as a burial place to those who have disputed it, becomes the prize of those rivers of blood with which it is for ever stained. O divine Reconciliator of men ! return then once more upon the earth, since the peace which thou broughtest to it at thy birth still leaves so many wars and so many calamities in the universe !

Nor is this all : that circle itself, which unites us under the same laws, unites not hearts and affections ; hatreds and jealousies divide citizens equally as they divide nations ; animosities are perpetuated in families, and fathers transmit them to their children, as an accursed inheritance. In vain may the authority of the prince disarm the hand, it disarms not the heart ; in vain may the sword be wrested from them, with the sword of the tongue they

they continue a thousand times more cruelly to pierce their enemy; hatred, under the necessity of confining itself within, becomes deeper and more rancorous, and to forgive is looked upon as a dishonourable weakness. Oh! my brethren, in vain then hath Jesus Christ descended upon the earth! He is come to bring peace to us; he hath left it to us as his inheritance; nothing hath he so strongly recommended to us as that of loving each other; yet fellowship and peace seem as if banished from among us, and hatred and animosity divide court, city, and families; and those whom the offices, the interests of the state, decency itself, and blood ought, at least, to unite, tear, defame, would wish to destroy, and to exalt themselves on the ruins of each other: and religion, which shews us our brethren even in our enemies, is no longer listened to; and that awful threatening, which gives us room to expect the same severity on the part of God which we shall have shewn to our brethren, no longer touches or affects us; and all these motives, so capable of softening the heart, still leave it filled with all the bitterness of hatred. We tranquilly live in this frightful state: the justice of our complaints with regard to our enemies, calms us on the injustice of our hatred and of our rooted aversion towards them; and if, on the approach of death, we apparently hold out to them the hand of reconciliation, it is not that we love them more, it is because the expiring heart hath no longer the force

force to sustain its hatred, that almost all our feelings are extinguished, or, at least, that we are no longer capable of feeling any thing but our own weakness and our approaching dissolution. Let us then unite ourselves to the newly born Jesus Christ; let us enter into the spirit of that mystery; with him let us render to God that glory which is his due; it is the only mean of restoring to ourselves that peace, of which our passions have hitherto deprived us.

SER-

SERMON VI.

FOR THE DAY OF THE EPIPHANY.

MATTHEW ii. 2.

For we have seen his star in the east, and we are come to worship him.

TRUTH, that light of Heaven figured by the star which on this day appears to the magi, is the only thing here below worthy of the cares and the researches of man. It alone is the light of our mind, the rule of our heart, the source of solid joys, the foundation of our hopes, the consolation of our fears, the alleviation of our evils, the cure for all our afflictions: it alone is the refuge of the good conscience, and the terror of the bad; the inward punishment of vice, the internal recompense of virtue: it alone immortalises those who have loved it, and renders illustrious the chains of those who suffer

fer

fer for it, attracts public honours to the ashes of its martyrs and defenders, and bestows respectability on the abjection and the poverty of those who have quitted all to follow it : lastly, it alone inspires magnanimous thoughts, forms heroical men, souls of whom the world is unworthy, fages alone worthy of that name. All our attentions ought therefore to be confined to know it ; all our talents to manifest it ; all our zeal to defend it : in men we ought then to look only for truth, to have no wish of pleasing them but by truth, to esteem in them only truth, and to be resolved that they never shall please us but by it : in a word, it would appear that it should have only to shew itself, as on this day to the magi, to be loved ; and that it shews us to ourselves in order to teach us to know ourselves.

Nevertheless, it is astonishing what different impressions the same truth makes upon men. To some it is a light which directs their steps, and, in pointing out their duty, renders it amiable to them : to others it is a troublesome light, and, as it were, a kind of dazzling, which vexes and fatigues them : lastly, to many it is a thick mist which irritates, inflames them with rage, and completes their blindness. It is the same star which, on this day, appears in the firmament : the magi see it ; the priests of Jerufalem know that it is foretold in the prophets ; Herod can no longer doubt that it hath appeared, seeing wise men come from the extremities of the east, to seek, guided by its light, the new King of the Jews. Nevertheless, how dissimilar are the dispositions with which they receive the same truth manifested to them :

the

In the magi it finds a docile and sincere heart : in the priests, a heart mean, deceitful, cowardly, and dissembling : in Herod, a corrupted and hardened heart. Consequently, it forms worshippers in the magi ; dissemblers in the priests ; and in Herod a persecutor. Now, my brethren, such is still at present among us the lot of truth : it is a celestial light which is shown to us, says St Augustin : but few receive it, many hide and dim it, and a still greater number contemn and persecute it : it shews itself to all ; but how many indocile souls who reject it ? How many mean and cowardly souls who dissemble it ? How many black and hardened hearts who oppress and persecute it ? Let us collect these three marked characters in our gospel, which are to instruct us in all our duties relative to truth : truth received, truth dissembled, truth persecuted. Holy Spirit, Spirit of Truth, destroy in us the spirit of the world, that spirit of error, of dissimulation, of hatred against the truth ; and in this holy place destined to form ministers, who are to announce it even in the extremities of the earth, render us worthy of loving the truth, of manifesting it to those who know it not, and of suffering all for its sake.

PART I. I call truth that eternal rule, that internal light incessantly present within us, which, in every action, points out to us what we ought; and what we ought not to do; which enlightens our doubts; which judges our judgments; which inwardly condemns or approves us, accordingly as our behaviour is agreeable or contrary to its light; and which, in certain moments more splendid and bright, more evidently points out to us the way in which we ought to walk, and is figured to us by that miraculous light which, on this day, conducts the magi to Jesus Christ.
every

Now, I say that, the first use which we ought to make of truth being for ourselves, the church, on this day, proposes to us, in the conduct of the magi, a model of those dispositions which alone can render the knowledge of truth beneficial and salutary to us. There are few souls, however they may be plunged in the senses and in the passions, whose eyes are not, at times, opened upon the vanity of the interests they pursue, upon the grandeur of the hopes which they sacrifice, and upon the ignominy of the life which they lead. But, alas! their eyes are opened to the light, only to be closed again in an instant; and the sole fruit which they reap; from the truth which is visible to, and enlightens them, is that of adding to the misfortune of having hitherto been ignorant of it, the guilt of having afterwards known it in vain.

Some confine themselves to vain reasonings upon the light which strikes them, and turn truth into a subject of controversy and vain philosophy; others, others, with minds yet unsettled, wish, it would appear, to know it; but they seek it not in an effectual way, because they would, at bottom, be heartily sorry to have found it: lastly, others, more tractable, allow themselves to be wrought upon by its evidence; but, discouraged by the difficulties and the self-denials which it presents to them, they receive it not with that delight and that gratitude which, when once known, it inspires. And behold the rocks, which the dispositions of the fages of the east towards that light of Heaven, which comes to shew new routes to them, teach us to shun.

Accustomed, in consequence of a public profession of wisdom and philosophy, to investigate every thing, and reduce it to the judgment of a vain reason, and to be far above all popular prejudices, they stop not, however, before commencing their journey upon the faith of the celestial light, to examine if the appearance of this new star might not be solved by natural causes; they do not assemble from every quarter scientific men, in order to reason on an event so uncommon; they sacrifice no time to vain difficulties, which generally arise, more from the repugnance we feel to truth, than from a sincere desire of enlightening ourselves, and of knowing it. Instructed by that tradition of their fathers which the captive Israelites had formerly carried into the east, and which Daniel and so many other prophets had announced

there, relative to the Star of Jacob which should one day appear, they, at once, comprehended, that the vain reflections of the human mind have no connection with the light of Heaven; that the portion of light which Heaven shews them is sufficient to determine and to conduct them; that grace always leaves obscurities in the ways to which it calls us, in order not to deprive faith of the merit of submission; and that, whenever we are so happy as to catch a single gleam of truth, the uprightnes of the heart ought to supply whatever deficiency may yet remain in the evidence of the light.

Nevertheless, how many souls in the world, wavering upon faith, or rather enslaved by passions which render doubtful to them that truth which condemns them; how many souls, thus floating, clearly see, that, at bottom, the religion of our fathers hath marks of truth which the most high-flown and proudest reason would not dare to deny to it; that unbelief leads to too much; that, after all, we must hold to something; and, that total unbelief is a party still more incomprehensible to reason than the mysteries which shock it; who see it, and who struggle, by endless disputes, to lull that worm of the conscience which incessantly reproaches their error and their folly; who resist that truth, which proves itself in the bottom of their heart, under pretence of enlightening themselves; who apply for advice only that they may say

say to themselves, that their doubts are unanswerable ; who have recourse to the most learned, only to have the power of alleging, as a fresh motive of unbelief, the having had recourse in vain ? It would seem that religion is no longer but a matter of discourse ; it is no longer considered as that important affair in which not a moment is to be lost ; it is a simple matter of controversy, as formerly in the Arespagus ; it fills up the idle time ; it is one of those unimportant questions which fill up the vacancies of conversation, and amuse the languor and the vanity of general intercourse.

But, my brethren, “ the kingdom of God cometh not with observation.” Truth is not the fruit of controversy and dispute, but of tears and groanings ; it is by purifying our heart in meditation and in prayer that we alone must expect, like the magi, the light of Heaven, and to become worthy of distinguishing and of knowing it. A corrupted heart, says St Augustin, may see the truth ; but he is incapable of relishing or of loving it ; in vain do you enlighten and instruct yourselves ; your doubts are in your passions : religion will become evident and clear from the moment that you shall become chaste, temperate, and equitable ; and you will have faith from the moment that you shall cease to have vice. Consequently, from the instant that you cease to have an interest in finding religion false, you will find it incontestable ; no longer hate hate its maxims, and you will no longer contest its mysteries.

Augustin himself, already convinced of the truth of the gospel, still found, in the love of pleasure, a source of doubts and perplexities which checked him. It was no longer the dreams of the Manicheans which kept him removed from faith; he was fully sensible of their absurdity and fanaticism; it was no longer the pretended contradictions of our holy books; Ambrose had explained their purport and their adorable mysteries. Nevertheless, he still doubted; the sole thought of having to renounce his shameful passions in becoming a disciple of faith, rendered it still suspicious to him. He would have wished either that the doctrine of Jesus Christ had been an imposition, or that it had not condemned his voluptuous excesses, without which, indeed, he was then unable to comprehend how either an happy or a comfortable life could be led. Thus, always floating and unwilling to be settled; continually consulting, yet dreading to be instructed; by turns the disciple and admirer of Ambrose, and racked by the perplexities of a heart which shunned the truth, he dragged his chains, as he says himself, dreading to be delivered from it, he continued to start doubts merely to prolong his passions, he wished to be yet more enlightened, because he dreaded to be it too much; and, more the slave of his passion than of his errors, he rejected truth, which manifested itself to him, him, merely because he looked upon it as a victorious and irresistible hand which was at last come to break asunder those fetters which he still loved. The light of Heaven finds, therefore, no doubts to dissipate in the minds of the magi, because it finds no passion in their hearts to overcome; and they well deserve to be the first-fruits of the gentiles, and the first disciples of that faith which was to subjugate all nations to the gospel.

Not but it is often necessary to add, to our own light, the approbation of those who are established to distinguish, whether it be the right spirit which moves us; fallacy is so similar to truth, that it is not easy to avoid being sometimes deceived. Thus the magi, in order to be more surely confirmed in the truth of the prodigy which guides their steps, come straight to Jerusalem: they consult the priests and the scribes, as the only persons capable of discovering to them that truth which they seek; they boldly and openly demand, in the midst of that great city, "where is he that is born King of the Jews?" They propose their question with no palliations, calculated to attract an equivocal answer: they are determined to be enlightened, and wish not to be flattered; from their heart they seek the truth, and, for that reason, they find it.

New disposition, sufficiently rare among believers. Alas! we find not truth, because we never seek it with a sincere and upright heart: we diffuse a kind of mist over every attempt to find it, which

which conceals it from our view : we consult, but we place our passions in so favourable a light, we hold them out in colours so softened, and so similar to the truth, that we procure a reply of its being really so : we wish not to be instructed ; we wish to be deceived, and to add, to the passion which enslaves us, an authority which may calm us.

Such is the illusion of the majority of men, and frequently even of those who, become contrite, have quitted the errors of a worldly life. Yes, my brethren, let us search our own hearts, and we shall find, that, however sincere our conversion may otherwise be, yet there is always within us some particular point, some secret and privileged attachment, upon which we are not candid ; upon which we never but very imperfectly instruct the guide of our conscience ; upon which we seek not with sincerity the truth ; upon which, in a word, it would even grieve us to have found it : and from thence it is, that the weaknesses of the pious and good always furnish so many traits to the derision of the worldly ; from thence, we attract upon virtue continual reproaches and censures, which ought to light only upon ourselves. Nevertheless, to hear us speak, we love the truth ; we are desirous of having it shewn to us. But a convincing proof, of that being only a vain mode of speaking, is, that whatever concerns, or has any allusion to this cherished passion, is carefully avoided by all around us ; our friends are silent upon it ; our superiors periors are obliged to use an artful delicacy, not to injure our feelings; our inferiors are upon their guard, and employ continual precautions; we are never spoken to, but with lenitives which draw a veil over our sore; we are almost the only persons ignorant of our defect: the whole world sees it, yet no one has the courage to make it known to ourselves: it is clearly seen that we seek not with sincerity the truth; and that, far from curing us, the hand, which should dare to probe our sore, would only succeed in making a fresh one.

David knew not, and respected not the sanctity of Nathan, till after that prophet had spoken to him, with sincerity, of the scandal of his conduct; from that day, and ever afterwards, he considered him as his father and deliverer; but, with us, a person loses all his merit from the moment that he has forced us to know ourselves. Before that, he was enlightened, prudent, full of charity; he possessed every talent calculated to attract esteem and confidence; the John the Baptists were listened to with pleasure, as formerly by an incestuous king: but, from the moment that they have undisguisedly spoken to us; from the moment that they have said to us, "It is not lawful for thee," they are stripped, in our opinion, of all their grand qualities: their zeal is no longer but whim; their charity but an ostentation, or a desire to censure and contradict: their piety but an imprudence or a cheat, with which they cover their pride; their truth

truth but a mistaken phantom. Thus, frequently convinced in our own minds of the iniquity of our passions, we would wish others to give them their approbation ; forced, by the inward testimony of the truth, to reproach them to ourselves, we cannot endure that they should be mentioned to us by others : we are hurt and irritated that others should join us against ourselves. Like Saul, we exact of the Samuels, that they approve, in public, what we inwardly condemn ; and, through a corruption of the heart, perhaps more deplorable than our passions themselves, unable to silence truth in the bottom of our heart, we would wish to extinguish it in the hearts of all who approach us. I was right, therefore, in saying, that we all make a boast of loving the truth, but that few court it, like the magi, with an upright and a sincere heart.

Thus, the little attention which they pay to the difficulties, which seemed to dissuade them from that research, is a fresh proof of its sincerity and heartiness. For, my brethren, how singular must not this extraordinary step, which grace proposed to them, have at first appeared to their mind. They alone, of all their nation, among so many sages and learned men, without regard to friends and connections, in spite of public observations and derisions, while all others either contemn this miraculous star, or consider the attention paid to it, and the design of these three sages, as an absurd undertaking, undertaking, and a popular weakness, unworthy of their mind and knowledge, they alone declare against the common opinion; they alone entrust themselves to the new guide which Heaven sends them; they alone abandon their country and their children, and reckon, as nothing, a singularity, the necessity and wisdom of which the celestial light discloses to them.

Last instruction. The cause, my brethren, of truth being always unavailingly shewn to us, is, that we judge not of it by the lights which it leaves in our soul, but by the impression which it makes on the rest of men with whom we live: we never consult the truth in our heart; we consult only the opinions which others have of it. Thus, in vain doth the light of Heaven a thousand times intrude upon us, and point out the ways in which we ought to go; the very first glance which we afterwards cast upon the example of others who live like us, revives us, and spreads a fresh mist over our heart. In those fortunate moments when we consult the sole truth of our own conscience, we condemn ourselves; we tremble over a futurity; we promise to ourselves a new life; yet, a moment after, when returned to the world, and no longer consulting but the general example, we justify ourselves, and regain that false security which we had lost. We have no confidence in the truth which the common example disproves; we sacrifice it to error and to the public opinion;

it becomes suspicious to us, because it has chosen out us alone to favour with its light, and the very singularity of the blessing is the cause of our ingratitude and opposition. We cannot comprehend, that, to work out our salvation, is to distinguish ourselves from the rest of men; is to live single amidst the multitude; is to be an individual supporter of our own cause, in the midst of a world which either condemns or despises us; is, in a word, to count examples as nothing, and to be affected by our duty alone. We cannot comprehend, that, to devote ourselves to destruction, it requires only to live as others do; to conform to the multitude; to form with it only one body and one world; seeing the world is already judged; that it is that body of the antichrist which shall perish with its head and members; that criminal city, accursed and condemned to an eternal anathema. Yes, my brethren, the greatest obstacle in our hearts, to grace and truth, is the public opinion. How many timid souls, who have not the courage to adopt the righteous side, merely because the world, to whose view they are exposed, would join against them? Thus, the king of Assyria durst not declare himself for the God of Daniel, because the grandees of his court would have reprobated such a step. How many weak souls, who, disgusted with pleasures, only continue to pursue them through a false honour, and that they may not distinguish themselves from those who set an example of them? Thus, Aaron, in the midst of the Israelites, danced around the golden calf, and joined them in offering up incense to the idol which he detested, because he had not the courage, singly, to resist the public error and blindness. Fools that we are! it is the sole example of the public which confirms us against truth; as if men were our truth, or that it were upon the earth, and not in heaven, that we ought, like the magi, to search for that rule and that light which are to guide us.
who

It is true, that, frequently, it is not respect for the world's opinion, but the sufferings and self-denials it holds out to us, which extinguish truth in our heart: thus, it make us sorrowful like that young man of the gospel, and we do not receive it with that delight testified by the magi on seeing the miraculous star. They had beheld the magnificence of Jerusalem, the pomp of its buildings, the majesty of its temple, the splendor and grandeur of Herod's court; but the gospel makes no mention of their having been affected by that vain display of human pomp: they beheld all these grand objects of desire without attention, pleasure, or any exterior marks of admiration or surprize; they express no wish to view the treasures and the riches of the temple, as those ambassadors from Babylon formerly did to Hezekiah: solely taken up with the light of Heaven manifested to them, they have no eyes for any earthly object; feeling to the truth alone which has enlightened them, every thing else is an object of indifference, or a burden to them; and their heart, viewing all things in their proper light, no longer acknowledges either delight, interest, or consolation to be found in any thing but the truth.

On our part, my brethren, the first rays of truth which the goodness of God shed on our heart, probably excited a sensible delight. The project which we at first formed of a new life; the novelty of the lights which shone upon us, and upon which we had not as yet fully opened our eyes; the lassitude itself, and disgust of those passions of which our heart now felt only the bitterness, and the punishment; the novelty of the occupations which we proposed to ourselves in a change; all these offered smiling images to our fancy; for novelty itself is pleasing: but this, as the gospel says, was only the joy of a season. In proportion as truth drew near, it assumed to us, as to Augustin yet a sinner, an appearance less captivating and smiling. When, after our first glance, as I may say, of it, we had leisurely and minutely examined the various duties it prescribed to us; the grievous separations which were now to be a law to us; retirement, prayer, the self-denials which it proved to be indispensable; that serious, occupied, and private life in which we were to be engaged: ah! we immediately, like the young man of the gospel, began to draw back sorrowful and uneasy; all our passions roused up fresh

fresh obstacles to it; every thing now presented itself in gloomy and totally different colours; and that, which we had at first thought to be so attractive, when brought near, was no longer in our eyes but a frightful object, a way rugged, terrifying, and impracticable to human weakness.

Where are the souls, who, like the magi, after having once known the truth, never afterwards wish to see but it alone; have no longer eyes for the world, for its empty pleasures, or for the vanity of its pompous shews; who feel no delight but in the contemplation of truth; in making it their resource in every affliction; the spur of their indolence; their succour against temptation; and the purest delight of their soul? And how vain, puerile, and disgusting doth the world, with all its pleasures, hopes, and grandeurs, indeed appear to a soul who hath known thee, O my God! and who hath felt the truth of thine eternal promises; to a soul who feels that whatever is not thee is unworthy of him; and who considers the earth only as the country of those who must perish for ever! Nothing is consolatory to him but what opens the prospect of real and lasting riches; nothing appears worthy of his regard but what is to endure for ever; nothing has the power of pleasing him but what shall eternally please him; nothing is longer capable of attaching him but that which he is no more to lose; and all the trifling objects of vanity are no longer, on his part, but the embarrassments rassments of his piety, or gloomy monuments which recall the remembrance of his crimes.

Behold, in the instance of the magi, truth received with submission, with sincerity, and with delight; in the conduct of the priests let us see the truth dissembled; and, after being instructed in the use which we ought to make of truth with regard to ourselves, let us learn what is our duty, respecting it, to others.

PART II. The first duty required of us by the law of charity towards our brethren, is the duty of truth. We are not bound to bestow on all men our attentions, our cares, and our officious services; to all we owe the truth. The different situations in which rank and birth place us in the world, diversify our duties with regard to our fellow-creatures; in every situation of life that of truth is the same. We owe it to the great equally as to the humble; to our subjects as to our masters; to the lovers of it as to those who hate it; to those who mean to employ it against ourselves as to those who wish it only for their own benefit. There are conjunctures in which prudence permits to hide and to dissemble the love which we bear for our brethren; none can possibly exist in which we are permitted to dissemble the truth: in a word, truth is not our own property, we are only its witnesses, its defenders, and its depositaries. It is that spark, that light of God which should illuminate the whole world; and, when we dissemble

dissemble or obscure it, we are unjust towards our brethren, and ungrateful towards the Father of Light who hath spread it through our soul.

Nevertheless, the world is filled with dissemblers of the truth; we live, it would appear, only to deceive each other; and society, the first bond of which ought to be truth, is no longer but a commerce of dissimulation, duplicity, and cunning. Now, in the conduct of the priests of our gospel, let us view all the different kinds of dissimulation of which men render themselves every day culpable towards truth; we shall there find a dissimulation of silence, a dissimulation of compliance and palliation, a dissimulation of disguise and falsehood.

A dissimulation of silence. Consulted by Herod on the place in which the Christ was to be born, they made answer, it is true that Bethlehem was the place marked in the prophets for the fulfilment of that grand event; but they add not, that the star, foretold in the holy books, having at last appeared, and the kings of Saba and of Arabia coming with presents to worship the new chief who was to lead Israel, it was no longer to be doubted that the overshadowed had at last brought forth the righteous. They do not gather together the people in order to announce this blessed intelligence; they do not run the first to Bethlehem, in order, by their example, to animate Jerusalem. Wrapt up in their criminal timidity, they guard a profound silence;

silence; they iniquitously retain the truth, and, while strangers come from the extremities of the east loudly to proclaim in Jerufalem that the King of the Jews is born, the priests, the scribes are silent, and sacrifice, to the ambition of Herod, the interests of truth, the dearest hope of their nation, and the honour of their ministry.

What a shameful degradation of the ministers of truth! The good-will of the prince influences them more than the sacred deposit of the religion with which they are entrusted; the lustre of the throne stifles, in their heart, the light of Heaven; by a criminal silence they flatter a king who applies to them for the truth, and who can learn it from them alone; they confirm him in error by concealing that which might have undeceived him; and how, indeed, shall truth ever make its way to the ear of sovereigns, if even the Lord's anointed, who surround the throne, have not the courage to announce it, but join their efforts, with those who dwell in courts, to conceal and stifle it?

But this duty, my brethren, is, in certain respects, common to you as to us; yet, nevertheless, there are few persons in the world, even of those who set an example of piety, who do not, almost every day, render themselves culpable towards their brethren of the dissimulation of silence. They think that they render to truth all that they owe to it, when they do not declare against it; when they hear virtue continually decried by the world-ly, ly, the doctrine of the world maintained, its abuses and maxims justified, those of gospel opposed or weakened, the wicked often blaspheming what they know not, and setting themselves up as judges of that faith which shall judge them; that they listen to them, I say, without joining in their impiety, is true, but they do not boldly shew their disapprobation, and content themselves with merely not authorising their blasphemies or their prejudices by their suffrage.

Now, I say that, being all individually intrusted with the interests of truth, to be silent when it is openly attacked in our presence, is to become, in a measure, its persecutor and adversary. But, I add, that you, above all whom God hath enlightened, you then fail in that love which you owe to your brethren, seeing your obligations with regard to them augment in proportion to the grace with which God hath favoured you; you also render yourselves culpable towards God of ingratitude; you do not make a proper return for the blessing of grace and of truth with which he hath favoured you, in the midst of your extravagant passions. He hath illuminated your darkness; he hath recalled you to himself, while wandering in treacherous and iniquitous ways; he, no doubt, in thus shedding light through your heart, hath not had your benefit alone in view; he hath meant that it should operate as the instruction or as the reproach of your connections, your friends, your subjects, or your masters; he hath intended to favour your age, your nation, your country, in favouring you; for his chosen are formed only for the salvation or the condemnation of sinners. His design has been to place in you a light which might shine amid the surrounding darkness, and be a salutary guide to your fellow-creatures; which might perpetuate truth among men, and render testimony to the righteousness and to the wisdom of his law, amidst all the prejudices, and all the vain conclusions of a profane world.

Now, by opposing only a cowardly and timid silence to the maxims which attack the truth, you do not enter into the views of God's mercy upon your brethren; you render unavailing to his glory and to the aggrandisement of his kingdom, that talent of the truth which he had entrusted to you, and of which he will one day demand a particular and severe reckoning; I say, more particularly of you who had formerly, with so much eclat, supported the errors and profane maxims of the world, and who had once been its firmest and most avowed apologist. He surely had a right to exact of you, that you should declare yourselves with the same courage in favour of truth; nevertheless, from a zealous partisan of the world, his grace hath only succeeded in making a timid disciple of the gospel. That grand air of confidence and of intrepidity with which you formerly apologised for the passions, has forsaken you ever since you have undertaken undertaken the defence of the interests of virtue ; that audacity which once imposed silence on truth, is now itself mute in the presence of error ; and truth, which, as St Augustin says, gives confidence and intrepidity to all who have it on their side, has rendered you only weak and timid.

I admit, that there is a time to be silent as well as a time to speak ; and that the zeal of truth hath its rules and measures ; but I would not that the souls, who know God and serve him continually, hear the maxims of religion subverted, the reputation of their brethren attacked, the most criminal abuses of the world justified, without having the courage to adopt the cause of that truth which they dishonour. I would not that the world have its avowed partisans, and that Jesus Christ have no one to stand up for him. I would not that the pious and good, through a mistaken idea of good breeding, dissemble upon those irregularities of sinners which they are daily witnessing ; while sinners, on the contrary, consider it as giving themselves an important and fashionable air, to defend and to maintain them in their presence. I would that a faithful soul comprehend that he is responsible to the truth alone ; that he is upon the earth solely to render glory to the truth : I would that he bear upon his countenance that noble and, I may say, lofty dignity, which grace inspires ; that heroic candour which contempt of the world and all its glory produces ; that generous and Christian liberty, which expects only eternal riches, which has no hope but in God, which dreads nothing but the internal Judge, which pays court to, and spares nothing but the interests of righteousness and of charity, and which has no wish of making itself agreeable but by the truth. I would that the sole presence of a righteous soul impose silence on the enemies of virtue; that they respect that character of truth which he should bear engraven on his forehead; that they crouch under his holy greatness of soul, and that they render homage, at least by their silence and their confusion, to that virtue which they inwardly despise. Thus, the Israelites, taken up with their dances, their profane rejoicings, and their foolish and impious shouts around the golden calf, stop all in a moment, and keep a profound silence on the sole appearance of Moses, who comes down from the mountain, armed with the law of the Lord and with his eternal truth. First dissimulation of the truth: a dissimulation of silence.
 Christian

The second manner in which it is dissembled, is that of softening it by modifications, and by condescensions which injure it. The magi, no doubt, could not be ignorant that the intelligence which they came to announce to Jerusalem would be highly displeasing to Herod. That foreigner, through his artifices, had seated himself on the throne of David; he did not so peaceably enjoy the fruit of his usurpation, but that he constantly had had a dread lest some heir of the blood of the kings of Judah should expel him from the heritage of his fathers, and remount a throne promised to his posterity. With what eye must he then regard men who come to publish, in the midst of Jerusalem, that the King of the Jews is born, and to proclaim him to a people so attached to, and so zealous for the blood of David, and so impatient under every foreign rule? Nevertheless, the magi conceal nothing of what they had seen in the east; they do not soften that grand event by measured expressions less proper to arouse the jealousy of Herod. They might have called the Messiah whom they seek, the Messenger of Heaven, or the longed-for of nations; they might have designated him by titles less hateful to the ambition of Herod: but, full of the truth which hath appeared to them, they know none of these timid and servile time-servings; persuaded that those, who are determined to receive the truth only through the means of their errors, are unworthy of knowing it. They are unacquainted with the art of covering it with disguises and considerations for individuals, which dishonour it: they boldly come to the point, and demand, “where is he that is born King of the Jews;” and, not satisfied with considering him as the Sovereign of Judea, they declare that heaven itself is his birth-right; that the stars are his, and make their appearance in the firmament only in obedience to his orders.

The

The priests and the scribes, on the contrary, forced, by the evidence of the scriptures, to render glory to the truth, soften it by guarded expressions. They endeavour to unite that respect which they owe to the truth, with that complaisance which they wish still to preserve for Herod: they suppress the title of king which the magi had given to him, and which had so often been bestowed by the prophets upon the Messiah; they design him by a title which might equally mark an authority of doctrine, or of superior power: they announce him rather as a legislator established to regulate the manners, than as a sovereign raised up for the deliverance of his people from bondage. And, notwithstanding that they themselves expect a Messiah, King, and Conqueror, they soften the truth which they wish to announce, and complete the blindness of Herod, with whom they temporise.

Deplorable destiny of the great! the lips of the priests quiver in speaking to them; from the moment that their passions are known they are temporised with; truth never offers itself to them but with a double face, of which one side is always favourable to them; the servants of God wish not avowedly to betray their ministry and the interests of truth; but they wish to conciliate them with their own interest: they endeavour to save, as it were, both the rule and their passions, as if the passions could subsist with that rule which condemns them. It seldom happens that the great
are

are instructed, because it seldom happens that the intention is not to please in instructing them. Nevertheless, the greater part would love the truth were it once known to them: the passions and the extravagancies of the age, nourished by all the pleasures which surround them, may lead them astray; but a remaining principle of religion renders truth always respectable to them. We may venture to say, that ignorance condemns more princes and persons of high rank than people of the lowest condition; and, that the mean complaisance which is paid to them, is more dishonourable to the ministry, and is the cause of more reproach to religion, than the most notorious scandals which afflict the church.

The conduct of these priests appears base to you, my brethren: but, if you are disposed to enter into judgment with yourselves, and to follow yourselves through the detail of your duties, of your friendships, of your conversations, you will see that all your discourses, and all your proceedings, are merely mollifications of the truth, and temporisings in order to reconcile it with the prejudices, or the passions of those with whom it is your lot to live. We never hold out the truth to them but in a point of view in which it may please; in their most despicable vices we always find some favourable side; and, as all the passions have always some apparent resemblance to some virtue, we never fail to save ourselves through the assistance of that resemblance.

Thus, in the presence of an ambitious person, we never fail to hold forth the love of glory, and the desire of exalting one's self, only as tendencies which give birth to great men; we flatter his pride; we inflame his desires with hopes and with false and chimerical predictions; we nourish the error of his imagination by bringing phantoms within his reach, upon which he incessantly feasts himself. We perhaps venture, in general terms, to pity men who interest themselves so deeply for things which chance alone bestows, and of which death shall perhaps deprive us to-morrow; but we have not the courage to censure the madman who, to that vapour, sacrifices his quiet, his life, and his conscience. With a vindictive person we justify his resentment and anger; we justify his guilt in his mind, by countenancing the justice of his accusations; we spare his passion in exaggerating the injury and fault of his enemy. We perhaps venture to say, how noble it is to forgive; but we have not the courage to add, that the first step towards forgiveness is the ceasing to speak of the injury received.

With a courtier equally discontented with his own fortune, and jealous of that of others, we never fail to expose his rivals in the most unfavourable light: we artfully spread a cloud over their merit and their glory, lest they should injure the jealous

jealous eyes of him who listens to us : we diminish, we cast a shade over the fame of their talents and of their services ; and, by our iniquitous crouchings to his passion, we nourish it, we assist him in blinding himself, and induce him to consider, as honours unjustly ravished from himself, all those which are bestowed upon his brethren. What shall I say ? With a prodigal, his profusions are no longer, in our mouths, but a display of generosity and magnificence. With a miser, his sordid callousness of heart, in which every feeling is lost, is no longer but a prudent moderation, and a laudable domestic economy. With a person of high rank, his prejudices and his errors always find in us ready apologies ; we respect his passions equally as his authority, and his prejudices always become our own. Lastly, We catch the infection, and imbibe the errors of all with whom we live ; we transform ourselves, as I may say, into otherfelves ; our grand study is to find out their weaknesses, that we may appropriate and apply them to our own purposes ; we have, in fact, no language of our own ; we always speak the language of others ; our discourses are merely a repetition of their prejudices ; and this infamous debasement of truth we call knowledge of the world, a prudence which knows its own interest, the grand art of pleasing and of succeeding in the world. “ O ye “ sons of men ! how long will ye love vanity, and “ seek after leasing ?”

Yes, my brethren, by that we perpetuate error among men; we authorise every deceit; we justify every false maxim; we give an air of innocence to every vice; we maintain the reign of the world, and of its doctrine, against that of Jesus Christ; we corrupt society, of which truth ought to be the first tie; we pervert those duties and mutual offices of civil life, established to animate us to virtue, into snares, and inevitable occasions of a departure from righteousness; we change friendship, which ought to be a grand resource to us against our errors and irregularities, into a commerce of dissimulation and mutual deception: by that, in a word, we render truth hateful and ridiculous by rendering it rare among men; and, when I say we, I mean more especially the souls who belong to God, and who are intrusted with the interests of truth upon the earth. Yes, my brethren, I would that faithful souls had a language peculiar to them amid the world; that other maxims, other sentiments, were found in them than in the rest of men; and, while all others speak the language of the passions, that they alone speak the language of truth. I would that, while the world hath its Balaams, who, by their discourses and counsels, authorise irregularity and licentiousness, piety had its Phineases, who durst boldly adopt the interests of the law of God, and of the sanctity of its maxims: that, while the world hath its impious philosophers and false sages, who think that it does them honour

honour openly to proclaim, that we ought to live only for the present, and that the end of man is, in no respect, different from that of the beast, piety had its Solomons, who, undeceived by their own experience, durst publicly avow, that, excepting the fear of the Lord and the observance of his commandments, all else is vanity and vexation of spirit: that, while the world hath its charms and enchantments, which seduce kings and the people by their delusions and flatteries, piety had its Moses and Aarons, who had the courage to confound, by the sole force of truth, their imposition and artifice: in a word, that, while the world hath its priests and its scribes, who, like those of the gospel, weaken the truth, piety had its magi, who dread not to announce it in the presence even of those to whom it cannot but be displeasing.

Not that I condemn the modifications of a sage prudence, which apparently gives up something to the prejudices of men, only that it may more surely recall them to rule and duty. I know that truth loves neither rash nor indiscreet defenders; that the passions of men require a certain deference and management; that they are in the situation of sick persons, to whom it is often necessary to disguise and render palatable their medicines, and to cure them without their privity. I know that all deferences paid to the passions, when their tendency is to establish the truth, are not weakeners, but auxiliaries of it; and that the grand rule of the zeal of truth, is prudence and charity. But such is not the intention when they weaken it by flattery and servile adulations; they seek to please, and not to edify; they substitute themselves in the place of truth; and their sole wish is to attract those suffrages which are due to it alone. And, let it not be said that it is more through souness and ostentation, than through charity, that the just claim a merit in disdaining to betray truth. The world, which is always involved in deceit, of which the commerce and mutual ties revolve only upon dissimulation and artifice, which considers these even as an honourable science, and which is totally unacquainted with this noble rectitude of heart, cannot suppose it in others; it is its profound corruption which is the cause of its suspecting the sincerity and the courage of the upright; it is a mode of acting which appears ridiculous, because it is new to it; and, as it finds in it so marked a singularity, it loves better to suppose that it is rather the consequence of pride, or folly, than of virtue.
zeal

From thence it is that the truth is not only disguised, but it is likewise openly betrayed. Last dissimulation of the priests of our gospel: a dissimulation of falsehood. They are not satisfied with quoting the prophecies in obscure and mollified terms: but, seeing that the magi did not return to Jerusalem as they had intended, they add, no doubt in order to calm Herod, that, ashamed of not having been able to find that new King of whom whom they came in search, they have not had the courage to return: that they are strangers little versed in the knowledge of the law and of the prophets; and that the light of Heaven, which they pretended to follow, was nothing but a vulgar illusion, and a superstitious prejudice of a rude and credulous nation. And such must indeed have been their language to Herod, since they themselves act according to it, and do not run to Bethlehem to seek the new-born King, in order, it appears, to complete the persuasion of Herod, that there was more credulity than truth in the superstitious research of these magi.

And behold to what we at last come: in consequence of a servile compliance with the passions of men, and of continually wishing to please them at the expence of truth, we at last openly abandon it; we cowardly and downrightly sacrifice it to our interest, our fortune, and our reputation; we betray our conscience, our duty, and our understanding; and, consequently, from the moment that truth becomes irksome to us, or renders us displeasing, we disavow it, and deliver it up to oppression and iniquity; like Peter, we deny that we have ever been seen as its disciple. In this manner we change our heart into a cowardly and groveling one, to which any profitable falsehood costs nothing; into an artificial and pliable heart, which assumes every form, and never possesses any determinate one; into a weak and flattering heart, which has not the courage to refuse

refuse its suffrage to any thing but unprofitable and unfortunate virtue ; into a corrupted and interested heart, which makes subservient to its purposes, religion, truth, justice, and all that is most sacred among men ; in a word, a heart capable of every thing except that of being true, noble, and sincere. And think not that sinners of this description are so very rare in the world. We shun only the notoriety and shame of these faults ; secret and secure basenesses find few scrupulous hearts ; we often love only the reputation and glory of truth.

It is only proper to take care that, in pretending to defend the truth, we are not defending the mere illusions of our own mind. Pride, ignorance, and self-conceit, every day furnish defenders to error, equally intrepid and obstinate as any of whom faith can boast. The only truth worthy of our love, of our zeal, and of our courage, is that held out to us by the church : for it alone we ought to endure every thing ; beyond that, we are no longer but the martyrs of our own obstinacy and vanity.

O my God ! pour then through my soul that humble and generous love of the truth, with which thy chosen are filled in heaven, and which is the only characteristic mark of the just upon the earth. Let my life be only such as to render glory to thine eternal truths ; let me honour them through the sanctity of my manners ; let me defend them through zeal for thy interests alone, and enable me continually to oppose them to error and vanity:
annihilate

annihilate in my heart those human fears, that prudence of the flesh which dreads to lay open to persons their errors and their vices. Suffer not that I be a feeble reed which bends to every blast, nor that I ever blush to bear the truth imprinted on my forehead, as the most illustrious title with which thy creature can glorify himself, and as the most glorious mark of thy mercies upon my soul. In effect, it is not sufficient to be the witness and depositary of it, it is also necessary to be its defender: character contrasted with that of Herod, who is, in our gospel at present, its enemy and persecutor. Last instruction with which our gospel furnishes us: the truth persecuted.

PART III. If it is a crime to withstand the truth when it shines upon us; iniquitously to withhold it when we owe it to others; it is the fulness of iniquity, and the most distinguished character of reprobation, to persecute and combat it. Nevertheless, nothing more common in the world than this persecution of truth; and the impious Herod, who, on the present occasion, sets himself up against it, has more imitators than is supposed.

For, in the first place, he persecutes it through that repugnancy which he visibly shews to the truth, and which induces all Jerusalem to follow his example; and this is what I call a persecution of scandal. Secondly, He persecutes it by endeavouring to corrupt the priests, and even by laying snares for the piety of the magi; and this is what I call

I call a perfecution of seduction. Lastly, He persecutes it by shedding innocent blood ; and this is a perfecution of power and violence. Now, my brethren, if the brevity of a discourse permitted me to examine these three descriptions of perfecution of the truth, there is not perhaps one of them of which you would not find yourselves culpable.

For, 1^{stly}, Who can flatter himself with not being among the number of the persecutors of truth, under the description of scandals ? I even speak not of those disorderly souls who have erected the standard of guilt and licentiousness, and who pay little, if indeed any, attention to the public opinion : the most notorious scandals are not always those which are most to be dreaded ; and avowed debauchery, when carried to a certain degree, occasions, in general, more censures upon our conduct than imitations of our excesses. I speak of those souls delivered up to the pleasures, to the vanities, and to all the abuses of the age, and whose conduct, in other respects regular, is not only irreproachable in the sight of the world, but attracts even the praises and the esteem of men ; and I say that they persecute the truth through their sole examples, that they undo, as much as in them lies, the maxims of the gospel in every heart ; that they cry out to all men, that shunning of pleasures is a needless precaution ; that love of the world and the love of virtue are not at all incompatible ; that a taste for theatres, for dress, and for all public amusements, ments, is entirely innocent ; and that it is easy to lead a good life even while living like the rest of the world. This worldly regularity is therefore a continual persecution of the truth ; and so much the more dangerous, as it is an authorised persecution which has nothing odious in it, and against which no precaution is taken ; which attacks the truth without violence, without effusion of blood, under the smiling image of peace and society ; and which, through these means, occasions more deserters from the truth than ever all tyrants and tortures formerly did.

I speak even of those good characters who only imperfectly fulfil the duties of piety, who still retain, too, public remains of the passions of the world and of its maxims : and, I say, that they persecute the truth through these unfortunate remains of infidelity and weakness ; that they are the occasion of its being blasphemed by the impious and other sinners ; that they authorise the senseless discourses of the world against the piety of the servants of God ; that they are the cause of souls being disgusted with virtue, who might otherwise feel themselves disposed to it ; that they confirm, in the path of error, those who seek pretexts to remain in it : in a word, that they render virtue either suspicious or ridiculous. Thus, still every day, as the Lord formerly complained through his prophet Jeremiah, the backsliding Israel, that is to say, the world, justifies herself more than treacherous Judah, that is to say, the weaknesse of the good : I mean to say, that the world thinks itself secure when it sees that those souls, who profess piety, join in its pleasures and frivolities ; are warm, like the rest of men, upon fortune, upon favour, upon preferences, and upon injuries ; pursue their own ends, have still a desire of pleasing, eagerly seek after distinctions and favours, and sometimes make even piety subservient towards more surely attaining them. Ah ! it is then that the world triumphs, and that it feels itself comforted in the comparison ; it is then that, finding such a resemblance between the virtue of the good and its own vices, it feels tranquil upon its situation, and thinks that it is needless to change, since, in changing the name, the same things are still retained.

And it is here that I cannot prevent myself from saying, with the apostle Peter, to you, whom God hath recalled from the ways of the world and of the passions, to those of truth and righteousness ; let us act in such a manner among the worldly, that, in place of decrying virtue as they have hitherto done, and of despising or censuring those who practice it ; the good works which they shall behold in us, our pure and holy manners, our patience under scorn, our wisdom and our circumspection in discourse, our modesty and humility in exaltation, our equality of mind and submission under disgrace, our gentleness towards our inferiours, riors, our regard for our equals, our fidelity towards our masters, our universal charity towards our brethren, force them to render glory to God, make them to respect and even to envy the destiny of virtue, and dispose their hearts to receive the grace of light and of truth when it shall deign to visit them, and to enlighten them upon their erroneous ways. Let us shut up the mouth of all the enemies of virtue by the sight of an irreprehensible life : let us honour piety, that it may honour us : let us render it respectable if we wish to gain partisans to it : let us furnish to the world examples which condemn it, and not censures which justify it : let us accustom it to think, that godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise not only of the life to come, but also peace, satisfaction, and content, which are the only good, and the only real pleasures of the present life.

To this persecution of scandal Herod adds a persecution of seduction : he tempts the sanctity and the fidelity of the ministers of the law : he wishes to make the zeal and the holy boldness of the magi instrumental to his impious designs : in a word, he neglects nothing to undo the truth before he openly attacks it.

And behold a fresh manner in which we continually persecute the truth. In the first place, We weaken the piety of the just by accusing their fervor of excess, and by struggling to persuade them that they do too much ; we exhort them, like the grand tempter, to change their stones into bread ; that is to say, to abate from their austerities, and to change that retired, gloomy, and laborious life, into a more ordinary and comfortable one : we give them room to dread, that the sequel will not correspond with these beginnings : in a word, we endeavour to draw them nearer to us, being unwilling to raise ourselves to a level with them.
grand

2dly, We perhaps tempt even their fidelity and their innocence, by giving the most animated descriptions of those pleasures from which they fly : like the wife of Job, we blame their simplicity and weakness : we exaggerate to them the inconveniences of virtue and the difficulties of perseverance : we shake them by the example of unfaithful souls, who, after putting their hand to the plough, have cast a look behind, and abandoned their labour : what shall I say ? We perhaps attack even the immovable ground-work of faith, and we insinuate the inutility of the self-denials it proposes, from the uncertainty of its promises.

3dly, We harass, by our authority, the zeal and the piety of those persons who are dependent upon us : we exact duties of them, either incompatible with their innocence, or dangerous to their virtue : we place them in situations either painful or trying to their faith : we interdict them from practices and observances, either necessary for their support in piety, or profitable towards their progress in it : in a word, we become domestic tempters
with

with respect to them, being neither capable of tasting good ourselves nor of suffering it in others, and performing, towards these souls, the office of the demon, who only watches in order to destroy. Lastly, We render ourselves culpable of this perfection of seduction, by making our talents instrumental to the destruction of the reign of Jesus Christ: the talents of the body in inspiring iniquitous passions; in placing ourselves in hearts where God alone ought to be; in corrupting the souls for whom Jesus Christ gave his blood: the talents of the mind in inducing to vice; in embellishing it with all the charms most calculated to hide its infamy and horror; in presenting the poison under the most alluring and seductive form; and in rendering it immortal by lascivious works, through the means of which a miserable author shall, to the end of ages, preach up vice, corrupt hearts, and inspire his brethren with every deplorable passion which had enslaved himself during life; shall see his punishment and his torments increased in proportion as the impious fire he has lighted up shall spread upon the earth; shall have the shocking consolation of declaring himself, even after death, against his God, of gaining souls from him whom he had redeemed, of still insulting his holiness and majesty, of perpetuating his own rebellion and disorders even beyond the tomb, and of making, even to the fulfilment of time, the crimes of all men his own crimes. Wo, saith the Lord, to all

all those who rise up against my name and glory, and who lay snares for my people: I will take vengeance of them on the day of my judgment: I will demand of them the blood of their brethren whom they have seduced, and whom they have caused to perish: and I will multiply upon them, and make them for ever to feel the most dreadful evils, in return for that glory which they have ravished from me.

But, a last description of persecution, still more fatal to truth, is that which I call a persecution of power and violence. Herod, having gained nothing by his artifices, at last throws off the mask, openly declares himself the persecutor of Jesus Christ, and wishes to extinguish in its birth that light which comes to illuminate the whole world.

The sole mention of the cruelty of that impious prince strikes us with horror; and it does not appear that so barbarous an example can ever find imitators among us: nevertheless, the world is full of these kinds of public and avowed persecutors of the truth: and, if the church be no longer afflicted with the barbarity of tyrants, and with the effusion of her children's blood, she is still every day persecuted by the public derisions which the worldly make of virtue, and by the ruin of those faithful souls whom she, with grief, so often beholds sinking under the dread of their derisions and censures.

Yes, my brethren, those discourses which you so readily allow yourselves against the piety of the servants

servants of God, of those souls who, by their fervent homages, recompense his glory for your crimes and insults; those derisions of their zeal and of their holy intoxication for their God; those biting sarcasms which rebound from their person upon virtue itself, and are the most dangerous temptation of their penitence: that severity on their account, which forgives them nothing, and changes even their virtues into vices; that language of blasphemy and of mockery, which throws an air of ridicule over the seriousness of their compunction; which gives appellations of irony and contempt to the most respectable practices of their piety; which shakes their faith, checks their holy resolutions, disheartens their weakness, makes them, as it were, ashamed of virtue, and often is the cause of their returning to vice: behold what, with the saints, I call an open and declared persecution of the truth. You persecute in your brother, says St Augustin, that which the tyrants themselves have never persecuted; they have deprived him only of life; your scheme is to deprive him of innocence and virtue: their persecution extended only to the body; you carry yours even to the destruction of his soul.

What, my brethren! is it not enough that you do not yourselves serve the God for whom you are created? (This is what the first defenders of faith, the Tertullians and the Cyprians, formerly said to the Pagan persecutors of the faithful; and must it be that we, alas! have the same complaints to make against

against Christians?) Is it not enough? Must you also persecute those who serve him? You are then determined neither to adore him yourselves nor to suffer that others do it? You every day forgive so many extravagancies to the followers of the world, so many unreasonable passions; you excuse them; what do I say? You applaud them in the inordinate desires of their heart: in their most shameful passions you find constancy, fidelity, and dignity: You give honourable names to their most infamous vices; and it is a just and faithful soul alone, a servant of the true God, who has no indulgence to expect from you, and is certain of attracting upon himself your contempt and censures? But, my brethren, theatrical and other amusements are publicly licensed, and nothing is said against them: the madness of gambling has its declared partisans, and they are quietly put up with: ambition has its worshippers and slaves, and they are even commended: voluptuousness has its altars and victims, and no one contests them: avarice has its idolaters, and not a word is said against them: all the passions, like so many sacrilegious divinities, have their established worship, without the smallest exception being taken; and the sole Lord of the universe, and the Sovereign of all men, and the only God upon the earth, either shall not be served at all, or shall not be it with impunity, and without every obstacle being placed in the way of his service?

Great

Great God! avenge then thine own glory: render again to thy servants that honour and that lustre which the impious unceasingly ravish from them: do not, as formerly, send ferocious beasts from the depths of their forests to devour the contemners of virtue, and of the holy simplicity of thy prophets; but deliver them up to their inordinate desires, still more cruel and insatiable than the lion or the bear, in order that, worn out, racked by the internal convulsions and the frenzies of their own passions, they may know all the value and all the excellence of that virtue which they condemn, and aspire to the felicity and to the destiny of those souls who serve thee.

For, my brethren, you whom this discourse regards, allow me, and with grief, to say it here: must you be the instruments which the demon employs to tempt the chosen of God, and, if it were possible, to lead them astray? Must it be that you appear upon the earth merely in order to justify the prophecies of the holy books with regard to the persecutions, which, even to the end, are inevitable to all those who shall wish to live in godliness which is in Jesus Christ? Must you alone be the means of sustaining the perpetuity of that frightful succession of persecutors of faith and of virtue, which is to endure as long as the church? Must you, in default now of tyrants and of tortures, continue to be the rock and the scandal of the gospel? Renounce then yourselves the hope which is in Jesus Christ ; join yourselves with those barbarous nations, or with those impious characters who blaspheme his glory and his divinity, if to you it appears so worthy of derision and laughter to live under his laws, and according to his maxims. An infidel or a savage might suppose that we, who serve and who worship him, are under delusion ; he might pity our credulity and weakness, when he sees us sacrificing the present to a futurity, and an hope which, in his eyes, might appear fabulous and chimerical ; but he would be forced, at least, to confess that, if we do not deceive ourselves, and if our faith be justly grounded, we are the wisest and the most estimable of all men. But for you, who would not dare to start a doubt of the certitude of faith, and of the hope which is in Jesus Christ, with what eyes, with what astonishment would that infidel regard the censures which you so plentifully bestow upon his servants ? You prostrate yourselves before his cross, he would say to you, as before the pledge of your salvation ; and you laugh at those who bear it in their heart, and who ground their whole hope and expectation in it ! You worship him as your Judge ; and you contemn and load with ridicule those who dread him, and who anxiously labour to render him favourable to their interests ! You believe him to be sincere and faithful in his word ; and you look upon, as weak minds, those who place their trust in him, and who sacrifice every thing to the grandeur and to the certainty of his promises ! O man, so astonishing, so full of contradictions, so little in unison with thyself, would the infidel exclaim, how great and how holy must the God of the Christians therefore be, seeing that, among all those who know him, he hath no enemies but such as are of thy description !

Let us, therefore, respect virtue, my brethren ; let us honour, in his servants, the gifts of God, and the wonders of his grace. Let us merit, by our deference and our esteem for piety, the blessing of piety itself. Let us regard the worthy and pious as the souls who alone continue to draw down the favours of Heaven upon the earth, as resources established to reconcile us one day with God, as blessed signs, which prove to us that the Lord still looketh upon men with pity, and continueth his mercies upon his church. Let us encourage by our praises, if we cannot strengthen by our example, the souls who return to him : let us applaud their change, if we think it impossible, as yet, to change ourselves : let us glory in defending them, if our passions will not, as yet, permit us to imitate them. Let us reverence and esteem virtue. Let us have no friends but the friends of God : let us count upon the fidelity of men only in proportion as they are faithful to their Master and Creator : let us confide our sorrows and our sufferings only to those who can present them to him, who alone can console them : let us believe to be in our real interests interests only those who are in the interests of our salvation. Let us smooth the way to our conversion: let us, by our respect for the just, prepare the world to behold us one day, without surprise, just ourselves. Let us not, by our derisions and censures, raise up an invincible stumbling-block of human respect, which shall for ever prevent us from declaring ourselves disciples of that piety which we have so loudly and so publicly decried. Let us render glory to the truth; and, in order that it may deliver us, let us religiously receive it, like the magi, from the moment that it is manifested to us: let us not dissemble it, like the priests, when we owe it to our brethren: let us not declare against it, like Herod, when we can no longer dissemble it to ourselves, in order that, after having walked in the ways of truth upon the earth, we may all together one day be sanctified in truth, and perfected in charity.

SER-

SERMON VII.

THE DIVINITY OF JESUS CHRIST.

LUKE ii. 21.

His name was called Jesus, which was so named of the angel.

A GOD lowering himself so far as even to become man, astonishes and confounds reason; and into what an abyss of errors is it not plunged, if the light of faith come not speedily to its aid, to discover the depth of the divine wisdom concealed under the apparent absurdity of the mystery of a Man-God? Thus, in all times, this fundamental point of our holy religion, I mean the divinity of Jesus Christ, hath been the object most exposed to the foolish oppositions of the human mind. Men, full of pride, whose mouths ought to be filled with only thanksgivings for the ineffable gift, made to them by the Father of mercies, of his only Son, have continually insulted him, by vomiting forth the most impious blasphemies against that adorable Son. Full of blindness, who have not seen that the sole name of Jesus, which is given to him on this day, that name which he at first receives in heaven, and which an angel conveys to the earth, to Mary and Joseph, is the incontestable proof of his divinity. That sacred name establishes him the Saviour of mankind; Saviour, in that, through the effusion of blood, which becomes our ransom, he delivers us from sin, and from the consequences inseparable from it, viz. the tyranny of the demon and of hell: Saviour, in that, attracting upon his own head the chastisement due to our prevarications, he reconciles us with God, and opens to us afresh the entry of the eternal sanctuary, which sin had shut against us. But, my brethren, if the Son of Mary be but a mere man, of what value, in the eyes of God, will be the oblation of his blood? If Jesus Christ be not God, how will his mediation be accepted, while he would himself have occasion for a mediator to reconcile him with God?
only

This proof, which I only touch upon here, and so many others with which religion furnishes me, would quickly stop the mouth of the ungodly, and confound his impiety, if I undertook to shew them in all their light, and to give an extension in proportion to their importance. But, God forbid that that I should come here, into the holy temple where the altars of our divine Saviour are raised up, where his worshippers assemble, to enter into contestation, as if I spake in the presence of his enemies, or, to make the apology of the mystery of the Man-God, before a believing people, and a sovereign whose most illustrious and most cherished title is that of Christian. It is not, therefore, to combat these ungodly, that, on this day, I consecrate my discourse to the divinity and to the eternal glory of Jesus, Son of the living God; I come for the sole purpose of consoling our faith, while recounting the wonders of him who is its Author and Perfecter; and to reanimate our piety in exposing to you the glory and the divinity of our Mediator who is its object and its sweetest hope.
that

It is even proper to renew, from time to time, these grand truths in the minds of the great and of the princes of the people, in order to strengthen them against those discourses of infidelity which they, in general, are only too much in the way of hearing; and it is expedient sometimes to raise up the veil which covers the sanctuary, that they may have a view of those hidden beauties which religion only holds out to their respect and their homages.

Now, the divinity of the Mediator can only be proven by his ministry; his titles can appear only in his functions: and, in order to know whether

he

he be descended from heaven, and equal with the most High, it requires only to relate the purposes for which he came upon the earth. He came, my brethren, to form an holy and a believing people; a believing people, who subject their reason to the sacred yoke of faith; an holy people, whose conversation is in heaven, and who are no longer responsible to the flesh, to live according to the flesh: such is the grand design of his temporal mission.

The lustre of his ministry is the firmest foundation of our faith: the spirit of his ministry, the sole rule of our morals. Now, if he was only a man commissioned of God, the lustre of his ministry would be the inevitable occasion of our superstition and idolatry; the spirit of his ministry would be the fatal snare to entrap our innocence. Thus, whether we consider the lustre or the spirit of his ministry, the glory of his divinity remains equally and invincibly established.

O Jesus, sole Lord of all, accept this public homage of our confession and of our faith! While impiety blasphemes in secret, and under the shades of darkness against thy glory, allow us the consolation of publishing it with the voice of all ages in the face of these altars; and form, in our heart, not only that faith which confesses and worships thee, but also that which follows and which imitates thee.

PART I. God can manifest himself to men, only in order to teach them what he is, and what men owe

owe to him ; and religion is, properly speaking, but a divine light, which discovers God to man, and which regulates the duties of man towards God. Whether the most High shew himself to the earth, or whether he fill extraordinary men with his spirit, the end of all his proceedings can be only the knowledge and the sanctification of his name in the universe, and the establishment of a worship in which they render to him what is due to him alone.

Now, if the Lord Jesus, come in the fulness of time, was nothing more than an upright and innocent man, only chosen to be the messenger of God upon the earth ; the principal end of his ministry would have been that of rendering the world idolatrous, and of ravishing from the divinity that glory which is his due, in order to appropriate it to himself.

In effect, my brethren, whether we consider the lustre of his ministry in that pompous train of oracles and of figurative allusions which have preceded him in the wonderful circumstances which have accompanied him, and, lastly, in the works which he hath operated ; the lustre of it is such, that, if Jesus Christ was only a man similar to us, God, who hath sent him upon the earth arrayed in such glory and power, would himself have deceived us, and would be culpable of the idolatry of those who worship him.

The first signal character of the ministry of Jesus Christ, is that, from the beginning of the world; it was foretold and promised to men. Scarcely had the fall of Adam taken place, when the Restorer, whom his guilt had rendered necessary to the earth, is shewn to him from afar. In the following ages, God, it would appear, is only occupied in preparing mankind for his coming : if he manifest himself to the patriarchs, it is in order to confirm their faith in that expectation ; if he inspire prophets, it is in order to announce him ; if he choose to himself a people, it is for the purpose of making it the depositary of that grand promise ; if he prescribe sacrifices and religious ceremonies to men, it is in order to trace out in them, as from afar, the history of him who was to come. Whatever took place upon the earth seems to lead to that grand event : empires and kingdoms fall or rise only in order to prepare the way for it : the heavens are only opened to promise it : and, as St Paul says, the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain to bring forth the righteous, who is to come for the redemption of our body from the bondage of corruption and sin.

Now, my brethren, to inspire, from the beginning of all ages, the earth with the expectation of a man, and to announce him to it from heaven, is already, in fact, to prepare men to receive him with a kind of religion and worship ; and, even granting that Jesus Christ were to have only the eclat

eclat of that particular circumstance which distinguishes him from all other men, the superstition of the people, with regard to him, were he only a simple creature, had been to dread. But, even the circumstance of Jesus Christ being foretold is not so wonderful as those in which he hath been it, which are more surprizing than even the prophecies themselves. In effect, if Cyrus and John the Baptist have been foretold, long before their birth, in the prophecies of Isaiah and of Malachi, these are only individual prophecies, without consequence or train, and which are found in a single prophet; predictions which announce only particular events, and by which the religion of the people could never be caught or surpris'd; Cyrus to be the re-establisher of the walls of Jerusalem; John the Baptist to prepare the way for him who was to come; both in order to confirm, by the accomplishment of their particular prophecies, the truth and the divinity of all the prophecies which announce Jesus Christ.

But here, my brethren, it is a Messenger of Heaven, foretold by a whole people, announced, during four thousand years, by a long train of prophecies, desired of all nations, figured by all the ceremonies, expected by all the just, and shewn from afar in all ages. The patriarchs expire in wishing to see him: the just live in that expectation: fathers instruct their children to wish for him; and this desire is like a domestic religion which is perpetuated

perpetuated from age to age. The prophets themselves of the gentiles see the Star of Jacob shining from afar; and this great event is announced even in the oracles of idols. Here, it is not for a particular event; it is to be the resource of the condemned world, the legislator of all people, the light of nations, the salvation of Israel; it is in order to blot out iniquity from the earth, to bring an eternal righteousness, to fill the universe with the spirit of God, and to be the blessed bearer of an immortal peace to all men. What a pompous train! What a snare for the religion of all ages, if such magnificent preparations announce only a simple creature; and, more especially, in times when the credulity of the people so easily placed extraordinary men in the rank of gods!

Besides, when John the Baptist appears on the borders of the Jordan afraid, it would seem, that the single oracle which had foretold him might become an occasion of idolatry to the people whom the fame of his sanctity attracted round him, he performs no miracles; he never ceases to say: “ I am not he whom you expect; but one mightier than me cometh, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose;” he is only watchful, it would appear, to prevent superstitious honours. Jesus Christ, on the contrary, whom four thousand years of expectation, of allusions, of prophecies, of promises, had, with so much magnificence, announced to the earth; Jesus Christ, far from preventing venting the superstition of the people with regard to himself, comes in full authority and might; he does miracles and deeds which no one had ever done before him; and, not only he raises himself above John the Baptist, but he gives out that he is equal with God himself. Had the error been to dread, and, if to render to him divine honours had been an idolatry, where would be his zeal for the glory of him who sends him, or where would be his love for men?

And yet more, my brethren, all the extraordinary men of which the preceding ages could boast, all the just of the law and of the age of the patriarchs, had been only the imperfect types of the Christ; and again, each of them represented only some individual trait of his life and ministry; Melchisedec, his priesthood; Abraham, his quality of Head and Father of believers; Isaac, his sacrifice; Job, his persecutions and sufferings; Moses, his office of Mediator; Joshua, his triumphant entry into the land of the living with a chosen people. All these men, however, so venerable and so miraculous, were only rude sketches of the Messiah to come; and how great must that Messiah himself have been to be, seeing his figures were so illustrious and so shining! But, deprive Jesus Christ of his divinity and of his eternal origin, and the reality has nothing superior to the figure. I know, as we shall afterwards say, that, when we narrowly examine the lustre of his wonders, we shall see see them marked with divine characters which are only to be found in the life of those great men. But, to judge of them by the eyes of the senses alone, the parallel would not be favourable to Jesus Christ. Is he greater than Abraham? That man so great, that the Lord himself, among his most pompous names, had taken that of the God of Abraham, as if in order to proclaim to the world that the homages of a man, so righteous and so extraordinary, were more glorious to his sovereignty than the title of God of empires and of nations: so great, that the Jews believed themselves superior to all other nations of the earth, only because they were the posterity of that famous chief so cherished of Heaven; and that fathers, in recounting to their children the wonders of their nation and the history of their ancestors, animated them to virtue, only by putting them in remembrance that they were the children of Abraham and the members of a holy race? Is he more wonderful than Moses? That man, mighty in words and in deeds, mediator of an holy covenant, who broke the yoke of Egypt and delivered his people from bondage: that man, who was established the god of Pharaoh, who seemed the master of nature, who covered the earth with plagues, who divided seas, who made a new nourishment to be showered from heaven; that man, who saw the Lord face to face upon the holy mountain, and who appeared before Israel all resplendent in light? What is there there more astonishing or more magnificent in the life of Jesus Christ? Nevertheless, these were only rude sketches of his glory and might: he was to be the last finishing and perfection of them. Now, if Jesus Christ were not the image of the substance of his Father, and the eternal splendour of his glory, he, at the utmost, could only be equalled with these first men; and the incredulity of the Jews might, without blasphemy, demand of him: "Art thou greater than our father Abraham, or, than the prophets which are dead: whom makest thou thyself?" I have then justly said, that if, in the first place, you will estimate his ministry from that pompous train of oracles and of figures which have announced him, the splendour is such, that, if Jesus Christ be but a man similar to us, the wisdom itself of God would be culpable of the mistake of those who worship him.

But, my brethren, the Christ hath been foretold with his members: we are comprised in the prophecies which have announced him to the earth: we have been promised as an holy race, a spiritual people, who were to bear the law engraven on their heart, who were to sigh after only eternal riches, and who were to adore in spirit and in truth: like Jesus Christ, we have composed the expectation of the just of ancient times, and the desire of nations: we are that new Jerusalem, pure and undefiled, so often announced in the prophets, where God alone was to be known and worshipped; where faith

faith was to be the sole light to illuminate us ; charity the only bond of union ; and the land of promise the only hope to animates us. Now, do we answer an expectation so illustrious and so holy ? Are we worthy of having been the earnest desire of all those distant ages which have preceded us ? Do we merit to have been looked forward to like celestial men, who were to fill the earth with sanctity and righteousness ? Have not those ages been deceived in their expectation of the Christian people ? Were the just of those distant times to return upon the earth, could we present ourselves to them, and say : Behold those celestial, spiritual, temperate, believing, and charitable men, whom you expected ? Alas ! my brethren, the just of former times were Christians before the birth of faith ; and we are still Jews, under all the advantages of the gospel : we live solely for the earth : we know no true riches but the present good : our whole religion is grounded in the senses : we have received more assistances, but we are not more believing.

To the lustre of the prophecies which have announced Jesus Christ, we must add that of his works and of his miracles : second resplendent character of his ministry. Yes, my brethren, even admitting that Heaven had not promised him to the earth with such magnificence ; that the manner in which he was to appear to the earth had not constituted, during all these first ages, the sole occupation cupation and expectation of the universe ; did ever man appear more wonderful, more divine in his actions, and in all the circumstances of his life ?

I say, truly, in his actions and in his miracles. I know, and we come from saying it, that, in the ages which preceded him, extraordinary men had appeared upon the earth, to whom the Lord seemed to have delegated his omnipotence and virtue : in Egypt and in the desert Moses appeared the master of heaven and earth ; in the following ages Elijah came to present the same sight to men. But, when we narrowly examine their power itself, we find that all these miraculous men always bore with them the marks of weakness and dependance.

Moses only operated his miracles with his mysterious rod ; without it he was no longer but a weak and powerless man ; and it would seem that the Lord had attached the virtue of miracles to that morsel of parched wood for the purpose of making the Israelites sensible that, in his hands, Moses himself was but a weak and fragile instrument, whom he was pleased to employ in the operation of grand effects. Jesus Christ operates the grandest miracles, even without speaking ; and the sole touch of his garment cures inveterate infirmities. Moses communicates not to his disciples the power of operating miracles ; for it was an extraneous gift which he had received from Heaven, and which he had not the power of delegating : Jesus Christ leaves to his a still greater efficacy than had appeared even in himself. Moses always acts in the name of the Lord: Jesus Christ operates all in his own name; and the works of his Father are his. Nevertheless, this Moses, who had not been prophesied like Jesus Christ, who remitted not sins as he did, who never gave himself out as equal to God, but only as his faithful servant; this Moses, dreading that, after his death, his miracles should make him pass for a god, takes precautions lest, in the revolution of ages, the credulity of his people render to him divine honours: he goes up alone to the mountain, to expire far from the sight of his brethren, in the fear of their coming to offer up victims upon his tomb; and for ever removes his body from the superstition of the tribes: he does not shew himself to his disciples after his death; he contents himself with leaving to them the law of God, and employs every mean to obliterate himself from their remembrance. And Jesus Christ, after all the miracles which he operates in Judea, after all the prophecies which had announced him, after having appeared as a God upon the earth, his tomb is known to all the universe, exposed to the veneration of all people and ages; even after his death he shews himself to his disciples. Was superstition, then, less to be dreaded here? Or is Jesus Christ less zealous than Moses for the glory of the supreme Being, and for the salvation of men?

Elijah,

Elijah, it is true, raises up the dead ; but he is obliged to stretch himself out upon the body of the child whom he recalls to life ; and it is easily seen that he invokes a foreign power ; that he withdraws from the empire of death a soul which is not subjugated to him ; and that he is not himself the master of life and death. Jesus Christ raises up the dead as easily as he performs the most common actions ; he speaks as master of those who repose in an eternal sleep ; and it is thoroughly felt that he is the God of the dead as of the living, never more tranquil and calm than when he is operating the grandest things.

Lastly, The poets represented to us their sibyls and their priestesses as mad women while foretelling the future : it would seem that they were unable to sustain the presence of the false spirit which dwelt within them. Even our own prophets, when announcing future things, without losing the use of their reason, or departing from the solemnity and the decency of their ministry, partook of a divine enthusiasm : the soft sounds of the lyre were often necessary to arouse in them the prophetic spirit : it was easily to be seen that they were animated by a foreign impulse ; and that it was not from their own funds they drew the knowledge of the future, and those hidden mysteries which they announced to men. Jesus Christ prophecies as he speaks ; the knowledge of the future has nothing either to move, disquiet, or surprise surprife him, becaufe all times are contained in his mind; the future myfteries which he announces are not fudden and infufed lights to his foul; they are familiar objects to him, always prefent to his view, and the images of which he finds within himfelf; and all ages to come, under the immen- fity of his regards, are as the prefent day which illuminates us. Thus, neither the refurrection of the dead, nor the foretelling of the future, ever injures his natural tranquility; he sports himfelf, if I may venture to fay fo, in operating miracles in the univerfe; and if he, at times, appear to trem- ble and to be troubled, it is folely when viewing the fin and the perversity of his people; becaufe the more exalted one is in fanctity, the more does fin offer new horrors; and that the only thing which a Man-God can view with trembling, is the fpectacle of a confcience ftained with crimes.

Such is the omnipotency of Jefus Chrift: his miracles bear no mark of dependance: and, not fatified with thereby fhewing to us that he is equal to God, he alfo advertifes us, that, whatever wonder is operated by his Father upon the earth, he likewife operates; and that his Father's works are his. Hath any prophet, down to the period of Jefus Chrift, fpoken in this manner; and who, far from rendering glory to God as the author of every excellent gift, hath attributed to himfelf all the grand things which it had pleafed the Lord to operate through his miniftry?

But,

But, my brethren, if we have also been prophesied with Jesus Christ, we are moreover participators of his sovereignty over all creatures. Through faith the Christian is master of nature ; all is subjected to him, because he himself is inferior only to God ; all his actions ought to be miraculous, because they ought all to proceed from a sublime and a divine principle, and far above the powers of human weakness : we ought to be, and may say, miraculous men, masters of the world, in contemning it ; exalted above the laws of nature by overcoming them : sovereign disposers of events by a thorough and tranquil submission to them ; more powerful than death itself by wishing for it. Such is the sublimity of the Christian : and, how great must Jesus Christ have been, to have exalted human weakness to such a pinnacle of grandeur and might !

Finally, The last splendid character of his ministry is the marvellous and, till then, unheard-of circumstances which compose the whole course of his mortal life. I know that he came in nakedness and humiliation ; but, through these obscure and contemptible externals, what lustre are not even the enemies of his divinity forced to acknowledge there ?

In the first place, although they consider him as a man similar to us, they, nevertheless, believe him to have been formed, through the invisible operation of the most High, in the womb of a virgin gin of Judah, in opposition to the common law of the children of Adam. What glory already for a simple creature!

Secondly, Scarcely is he born, when celestial legions sing the praises of the Lord, and give us to understand, that this birth renders his glory to the most High, and brings an eternal peace upon the earth. What then is this creature who can render glory to the most High, whose glory is in himself alone? Immediately after this a new star calls the wise men from the heart of the East; and, guided by that miraculous light, those righteous men come from the extremities of the earth to worship the new King of the Jews.

Trace all the circumstances of his life. If Mary bring him to the temple, a righteous man and an holy woman proclaim his future greatness; and, transported with an holy joy, they die with pleasure, after having seen him whom they call the salvation of the world, the light of nations, and the glory of Israel. The doctors, assembled in the temple, behold, with terror, his infancy to be wiser and more enlightened than all the wisdom of old men. In proportion as he grows up, his glory unfolds itself: John the Baptist, that man, the greatest of the children of men, humbles himself before him, and says that he is not worthy of performing the meanest offices to him. A voice from Heaven declares that he is the well-beloved Son. The affrighted demons fly from before him, are unable to support the sole presence of his sanctity; and confess that he is the holy of God. Collect together testimonies so different and so new, circumstances so unheard-of, and so extraordinary: what is this man who appears upon the earth with so much eclat? And are not the people who have worshipped him at least excusable?

But these are only weak preludes of his glory. If he privately withdraw himself upon the Tabor, accompanied with three disciples, his glory, impatient, if I dare to say it, at having hitherto been held captive under the veil of humanity, openly bursts forth: he appears all resplendent in light: the heavenly Father, who then, it would appear, lest the glory of Jesus Christ should become an occasion of error and idolatry to the astonished disciples, spectators of this sight, ought to have warned them that this Jesus, whom they beheld so glorious, was nevertheless only his servant and messenger, declares to them, on the contrary, that this is his well-beloved Son, in whom he is well pleased, and affixes no bounds to the homages which, according to his pleasure, they are to render to him. When Moses appeared surrounded with glory, and, as it were, transfigured on mount Sinai, afraid lest the Israelites, always superstitious, should consider him as a god descended upon the earth, the Lord, amid a flame of fire, declared at the same time from on high, "I am that I am, and thou shalt worship only me." Moses himself appears before the people with only the tables of the law in his hands; as if to let them know that, notwithstanding the glory with which they had seen him arrayed, he nevertheless was only the minister, and not the author of the holy law; that he could offer it to them only engraven on stone, and that it belonged solely to God to engrave it on hearts. But, on the Tabor, Jesus Christ appears as the legislator himself: the new law is not given to him by his Father to bear it to men; he only commandeth them to listen to him, and from his own mouth he proposeth him as their legislator, or rather as their living and eternal law.
 people

What more shall I say, my brethren? If from the Tabor we pass to mount Calvary; that place, in which all the ignominy of the Son of Man was to be consummated, is not less, however, the theatre of his glory and divinity. All nature disorganised, confesses its Author in him; the stars which are hidden; the dead who arise; the stones of the tombs, which open of their own accord, and break in pieces; the veil of the temple, which is rent from top to bottom; even incredulity itself, which confesses him through the mouth of the centurion: all feel that it is not an ordinary man who dies, and that things take place upon that mount totally new and extraordinary.

Many righteous before him had died for the truth, by the hands of the impious: the head of the forerunner had lately been seen in the palace of Herod, as the price of voluptuousness : Ifaiah, by a grievous death, had rendered glory to God ; and, notwithstanding his royal blood, his august birth was ineffectual in sheltering him from those persecutions which are always the recompense of truth and zeal : many others had died for the sake of righteousness ; but nature seemed not wholly interested in their sufferings ; the dead forsook not their tombs to come and, as it were, reproach to the living their sacrilege : nothing, in any degree similar, had, as yet, appeared upon the earth.
of

Survey the rest of his mysteries ; every where you will find traits which distinguish him from all other men. If he rise up from among the dead, besides that it is through his own efficiency, (which no eye had ever yet beheld), it is not, like so many others, who had been raised up through the ministry of the prophets, to return once more into the empire of death : he arises, never more to die ; and, even here below, he receives an immortal life, which is what had never yet been accorded to any creature.

If he is carried up into heaven, it is not in a flaming chariot that he vanishes in the twinkling of an eye ; he ascends with majesty, and allows all leisure to his affectionate disciples to worship him, and to accompany their divine Master with their eyes and their homages. The angels, as if to receive him into his empire, come to greet this King of glory, and comfort the affliction of the disciples, by promising him once more to the earth, surrounded with glory and immortality. All here announces the God of heaven, who returns to the place from whence he came, and who goes to resume the possession of his own glory; at least, every thing inclines men to believe so.

And, in truth, my brethren, when Elijah is taken up to heaven in a fiery chariot, a single disciple is the only spectator of that miraculous ascension; it takes place in a retired spot, removed from the view of the other children of the prophets, who, perhaps more credulous and less enlightened than Eliseus, might have been inclined to render divine honours to that miraculous man. But Jesus Christ, surrounded with glory, mounts up to heaven before the eyes of five hundred disciples: the weakest, and those who were least confirmed in the faith of his resurrection, are the first who are invited to the holy mountain: nothing is dreaded from their credulity: on the contrary, their adorations are equally permitted as their regrets and tears; and a life full of prodigies, till then so unheard-of on the earth, is at last terminated by a circumstance still more wonderful, and sufficient of itself to make him to be regarded as a God, and to immortalise error and idolatry among men.

In effect, if the pagan ages, in order to justify the ridiculous and impious homages which they paid to their legislators, to the founders of empires, and to other celebrated men, gave it out, in their historians and poets, that these heroes were not dead, but had only disappeared from the earth; and that, being of the same nature with the gods, they had ascended to heaven, in order to assume their station among the other stars, which, according to them, were so many divinities who enlighten us, and for the purpose of there enjoying that immortality to which their divine birth entitled them: if so very vulgar a fiction had of itself been able to render men so long idolatrous, what impression must the reality of that fable not have made upon the people? And if the universe had worshipped impostors, who were falsely said to have mounted up to heaven, would it not have been excusable to worship a miraculous man, whom men, with their own eyes, had seen exalted above the stars?
and

But observe, my brethren, that the occasion of error finishes not with Jesus Christ; it is announced to us, that, at the end of ages, he will again appear in the heavens surrounded with power and majesty, and accompanied with all the heavenly host: all assembled nations shall, with trembling, await at his feet the decision of their eternal destiny: he will sovereignly pronounce their decisive sentence. The Abrahams, the Moseses, the Davids, the Elijahs, the John the Baptists, and all that ages have produced of great and most wonderful, shall be submitted to his judgment and to his empire;

he

he will himself be exalted above all power, all dominion, and all which is termed great in heaven and in the earth : he will erect his throne above the clouds, and sit on the right hand of the most High : he will appear Master, not only of life and death, but the immortal King of ages, the Prince of eternity, the Chief of an holy people, the supreme Arbitrator of all the created. What then is this man to whom the Lord hath delegated such power ? And the dead themselves, who shall appear in judgment before him, shall they be condemned for having worshipped him, when they shall see him clothed with such glory, majesty, and power ?

And one reflection, which I beg you to make in finishing this part of my discourse, is that, if only one extraordinary and divine trait were to be found here in the course of a long life, we might be inclined to believe, that it sometimes pleaseth the Lord to allow his glory and his power to shine forth in his servants. Thus, Enoch was carried up, Moses appeared transfigured on the holy mountain, Elijah was raised up to heaven in a fiery chariot, John the Baptist was foretold. But, besides that these were individual circumstances, and that the language of those miraculous men and of their disciples, with respect to the divinity and to themselves, left no room for superstition and mistake ; here, it is an assemblage of wonders, which all, or even taken separately, would have been sufficient to deceive the credulity of men : here, all the different ferent traits, dispersed among all these extraordinary men who had been considered almost as gods upon the earth, are collected together in Jesus Christ, but in a manner a thousand times more glorious and more divine. His prophecies, but more loftily, and with more striking characters, than John the Baptist: he appears transfigured in the holy mount, but surrounded with more glory than Moses: he ascends to heaven, but with more marks of power and majesty than Elijah: he penetrates into the future, but with more accuracy and clearness than all the prophets: he is produced, not only from a barren womb like Samuel, but likewise by a pure and innocent virgin: what shall I say? And not only he does not undeceive men by certain and precise expressions upon his origin as purely human; but his sole language, with respect to his equality to the most High; but the sole doctrine of his disciples, who tell us that he was in the bosom of God from all eternity, and that all hath been made through him, who call him their Lord and their God, who inform us that he is all in all things, would justify the error of those who worship him, had even his life been, in other respects, an ordinary one, and similar to that of other men.

O you! who refuse to him his glory and his divinity, yet, nevertheless, consider him as a messenger sent by God to instruct men, complete the blasphemy; and confound him with those impostors tors who have come to seduce the world, since, far from tending to establish the glory of God and the knowledge of his name, the splendour of his ministry has answered the sole purpose of erecting himself into a divinity, of placing him at the side of the most High, and of plunging the whole universe into the most dangerous, the most durable, the most inevitable, and the most universal of all idolatries.

For our part, my brethren, we who believe in him, and to whom the mystery of the Christ hath been revealed, let us never lose sight of that divine model which the Father shews to us from on high on the holy mount. Let us enter into the spirit of his merciful series of which he has what is called life is composed; they are mercifully different states of the life of the Christian on this earth: let us confess the new empire which Jesus Christ came to form in our hearts. The world, which we have hitherto served, hath never been able to deliver us from our grievances and wretchedness. We vainly fought in it, freedom, peace, and comfort of life; and we have found only slavery, disquiet, bitterness, and the curse of life. Behold a new Redeemer, who comes to bring peace to the earth; but it is not as the world promises it that he gives it to us. The world had wished to conduct us to peace and happiness through the pleasures of the senses, indolence, and a vain philosophy; it hath not been successful; by favouring our passions it hath hath only augmented our punishments: Jesus Christ comes to propose a new way for the attainment of that peace and happiness which we search after; detachment from and contempt of the world, mortification of the senses, self-denial, behold the new riches which he comes to display to men. Let us be undeceived: we have no happiness to expect, even in this life, but by repressing our passions, and by refusing ourselves the gratification of every pleasure which disquiets and corrupts the heart: there is no philosophy, but that of the gospel, which can bestow happiness, or make real sages, because it alone regulates the mind, fixes the heart, and, by restoring man to God, restores him to himself. All those who have pursued other ways, have found only vanity and vexation of spirit; and Jesus Christ alone, in bringing the sword and separation, is come to bring peace among men.

O my God! I know only too well that the world and its pleasures make none happy! Come then and resume thy influence over a heart which in vain endeavours to fly from thee; and which its own disgusts recall to thee in spite of itself: come to be its Redeemer, its peace, and its light, and pay more regard to its wretchedness than to its crimes.

Behold how the lustre of the ministry of Jesus Christ would operate as an inevitable occasion of idolatry in men, were he only a simple creature.

Let

Let us now see how the spirit of his ministry would become the snare of our innocence.

PART II. The lustre of the ministry of Jesus Christ is not the most august and most magnificent side of it. However dignified he hath appeared, in consequence of all the oracles which have announced him, the works which he hath operated, and the shining circumstances of his mysteries, these are merely the outward appearances, as I may say, of his glory and of his grandeur; and, in order to know all that he is, we must enter into the principle and spirit of his ministry. Now, in the spirit of his ministry are comprised his doctrine, his favours, and his promises. Let us display these in their proper extent, and prove, either that we must deny to Jesus Christ his quality of a righteous man, and of a messenger of the almighty God, which the enemies of his divinity grant him to have been, or we must admit that he is himself a God manifested in the flesh, and come down upon the earth in order to save mankind.

Yes, my brethren, this is an inevitable alternative: if Jesus Christ be holy, he is God; and, if his ministry be not a ministry of deceit and imposition, it is the ministry of eternal Truth itself which hath been manifested for our instruction. Now, the enemies of his divine birth are forced to admit, that he hath been a man righteous, innocent, and friend of God: and if the world hath beheld dark and impious minds, who have likewise wife dared to blaspheme against his innocence and to confound him with seducers, these have been only some individual monsters who were held in abhorrence by the human race, and whose names, too odious to all nature, are for ever buried in the same darkness from which the horror of their impiety originally came.

In effect, what man, till then, had appeared upon the earth with more incontestable marks of innocence and sanctity than Jesus, Son of the living God? In what philosopher had ever been observed such a love of virtue, so sincere a contempt of the world, so much charity towards men, such indifference for human glory, such zeal for the glory of the supreme Being, such elevation above whatever is admired or sought after by men? How great is his zeal for the salvation of men! It is to that object that he directs all his discourses, all his cares, all his desires, and all his anxieties. The philosophers criticised only the men, and solely endeavoured to expose their weakness or their absurdities: Jesus Christ never speaks of their vices but in order to point out their remedies. The former were the censurers of human weaknesses; Jesus Christ is their physician: the former gloried in being able to point out vices in others, from which they themselves were not exempted; he never speaks, but with the bitterest sorrow, of faults, from which his own innocence protects him, and even sheds tears over the disorders of an unbelieving city : it is easily seen that the former had no intention to reclaim men, but merely to attract esteem to themselves, by pretending to condemn them ; and that the only wish of the latter is to save them, and that he is little affected with their applauses or esteem.

Pursue the whole detail of his manners and of his conduct, and see if any righteous character hath ever appeared on the earth more generally exempted from all the most inseparable weaknesses of humanity. The more narrowly he is examined, the more is his sanctity displayed. His disciples, who have it best in their power to know him, are the most affected with the innocence of his life ; and familiarity, so dangerous to the most heroic virtue, serves only in his to discover fresh matter of wonder. He speaks only the language of Heaven : he never replies but when his answers may be useful towards the salvation of those who interrogate him. We see not in him those intervals, as I may say, in which the man re-appears ; on every occasion he is the messenger of the Most High. The commonest actions are extraordinary in him, through the novelty and the sublimity of the dispositions with which he accompanies them ; and, when he eats with the pharisee, he does not appear a man less divine than when he raises up Lazarus. Surely, my brethren, nature alone could never lead human weakness so far ; this is not a philosopher who enjoins to others what he doth not himself, it is a righteous character who, in his own examples, adopts the rules and precepts of his doctrine; and holy must he indeed be, seeing the very disciple who betrayed him, so interested to justify his own perfidy by an exposure of his faults, renders public testimony, however, to his innocence and sanctity; and that the whole challenged malice of his enemies hath never been able to convict him of sin.

not

Now, I say that, if Jesus Christ be holy, he is God; and that, whether you should consider the doctrine which he hath taught us with respect to his Father or with respect to men, it is no longer but a mass of equivocations or qualified blasphemies, if he be only an ordinary man, merely deputed by God for the instruction of men.

I say, whether you should consider it with respect to his Father. In effect, if Jesus Christ be but a simple messenger of the Most High, he comes, then, for the sole purpose of manifesting to idolatrous nations the unity of the divine essence. But, besides that his mission principally regards the Jews, who, for a long time past, had not returned to idolatry, and, consequently, needed not that God should raise up a prophet to reclaim them from an error of which they were not guilty, and a prophet whom they were taught from the beginning of the world to expect as the light of Israel, and the Redeemer of his people; and, besides, in what manner doth Jesus Christ fulfil his ministry, and what is his language guage with regard to the supreme Being? Moses and the prophets, charged with the same mission, never cease to proclaim that the Lord was one and the same; that it was impious to compare him to the similitude of the creature; and that they themselves were only his servants and messengers, vile instruments in the hands of a God, who, through them, operated great things. No dubious expression escapes from their mouth on so essential a point of their mission; no comparison of themselves to the supreme Being, always dangerous, in consequence of the natural tendency of man to prostitute his homages to men, and to raise up for himself palpable and visible gods; no equivocal term which might have blended themselves with the Lord, in whose name they spake, and have given birth to a superstition and an idolatry, to combat which they only came.

But, if Jesus Christ be only a messenger such as they were, with how much less fidelity doth he fulfil his ministry! He continually says that he is equal to his Father; he acquaints us, that he hath come down from heaven, and that he hath quitted the bosom of God; that he was before Abraham; that he was before all things; that the Father and he are one; that eternal life consists in the knowledge of the Son, as well as in the knowledge of the Father; that whatever is done by the Father, the Son also doth. Had any prophet, down to Jesus Christ, spoken in a language so new, so strange, strange, so disrespectful towards the supreme God; and who, far from rendering glory to God as the author of every good gift, hath attributed to his own efficiency the great things which the Lord had deigned to operate through his ministry. Every where he compares himself to the sovereign God; on one occasion, indeed, he says that the Father is greater than he; but what language is that, if he be not himself a God manifested in flesh? And would we not consider as a fool any man who should seriously tell us that the supreme Being is greater than he? Even to dare to compare himself with the divinity, is it not equalling himself to him? Is there any proportion either of greater or less betwixt God and man, betwixt the whole and nothing? But what do I say? Jesus Christ is not content with saying that he is equal to God; he even justifies the novelty of these expressions against the murmurings of the Jews who are offended at them; far from clearly undeceiving them, he confirms them in the offence: on every occasion he affects a language, which, unless cleared up and justified by his equality to his Father, becomes either foolish or impious. If he be not God, what came he to do upon the earth? He comes to scandalise the Jews, by giving them room to believe that he compares himself to the most High: he comes to seduce nations, by procuring to himself the adoration of the whole earth after his death: he comes to spread fresh obscurity over the universe, verse, and not, as he hath vaunted, to spread understanding, light, and the knowledge of God. What! my brethren, Paul and Barnabas rend their garments when they are taken for gods; they loudly proclaim to the people who wished to offer up victims to them: Worship the Lord alone, whose servants and ministers we are. The angel in the Revelation, when St John prostrates himself to worship him, rejects the homage with horror, and says to him: “Worship God alone; I am only thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus.” And Jesus Christ tranquilly suffers, that they render divine honours to him! And Jesus Christ praises the faith of the disciples who worship him, and who, with Thomas, call him their Lord and their God! And Jesus Christ even confutes his enemies who contest his divinity and divine origin! Is he then less zealous than his disciples for the glory of him who sends him? Or is it a matter of less importance to him, pointedly to undeceive the people on a mistake so injurious to the supreme Being, and which, in fact, destroys the whole fruit of his ministry?

Yes, my brethren, what blessing hath the coming of Jesus Christ brought to the world, if those who worship him be idolatrous and profane? All who have believed in him have worshipped him as the eternal Son of the Father, the image of his substance, and the splendour of his glory. There is but a small number of men in Christianity, who, though they acknowledge him as a messenger of God, yet refuse to him divine honours: even this sect, universally banished, and execrable even in those places where every error finds an asylum, is reduced to a few obscure and concealed followers; every where punished as an impiety from the instant that it dares to avow itself; and forced to hide itself in obscurity, and in the extremities of the most distant provinces and kingdoms. Is it, then, that numerous people of every tongue, of every tribe, and of every nation, which Jesus Christ came to form upon the earth? Is it a Jerusalem, formerly barren, and become fruitful, which was to contain tribes and nations in its bosom, and where the most distant isles, princes, and kings, were to come to worship? Are these the grand advantages which the world was to reap from the ministry of Jesus Christ? Is this, then, that abundance of grace, that plenitude of the spirit of God shed over all men, that universal regeneration, that spiritual and lasting reign which the prophets had foretold with such majesty, and which was to attend the coming of the Redeemer? What! my brethren, an expectation so magnificent is then reduced to the miserable sight of the world plunged into a new idolatry? That event, so blessed for the earth, promised for so many ages, announced with so much pomp, so earnestly longed for by all the righteous, and held out from afar to the whole universe universe as its only resource, was then to corrupt and to pervert it for ever? That church, so fruitful, of which kings and Cæsars, at the head of their people, were to be the children, was then to contain, in its bosom, only a small number of men, equally odious to heaven and to the earth, the disgrace of nature and of religion, and obliged to seek, in obscurity, a shelter for the horror of their blasphemy? And all the future magnificence of the gospel was then to be limited to the formation of the detestable sect of an impious Socinus?

O God! how wise and reasonable doth the faith of thy church appear, when opposed to the absurd contradictions of unbelief! And how consoling for those who believe in Jesus Christ, and who place their hope in him, to behold the abysses which pride digs for itself when it pretends to open new ways, and to sap the only foundation of the faith and of the hope of Christians.

Behold, my brethren, how the doctrine of Jesus Christ, with relation to his Father, establishes the glory of his eternal origin. Thus, when the prophets speak of the God of heaven and of the earth, their expressions are too weak for the magnificence and the grandeur of their ideas. Full of the immensity, the omnipotence, and the majesty of the supreme Being, they exhaust the weakness of the human language in order, if possible, to correspond with the sublimity of these images. That God, is he who measures the waters of the ocean in

in the hollow of his hand, who weighs the mountains in his balance, in whose hands are the thunders and the tempests, who speaks, and all is done; who amuses himself in upholding the universe. It was natural for simple men to speak in this manner of the glory of the most High; the infinite disproportion betwixt the immensity of the supreme Being and the weakness of the human mind must strike, dazzle, and confound it; and the most pompous expressions are too feeble to convey its astonishment and admiration.

But, when Jesus Christ speaks of the glory of the Lord, it is no longer in the pompous stile of the prophets: he calls him an holy Father, a righteous Father, a merciful Father, a Shepherd who pursues a strayed sheep, and kindly bears it home himself; a Friend who yields to the importunities of his friend; a Father feelingly affected with the return and the amendment of his son: it is clearly seen that this is a Child who speaks a domestic language; that the familiarity and the simplicity of his expressions suppose in him a sublimity of knowledge which renders the idea of the supreme Being familiar to him, and prevents him from being struck and dazzled, as we are, with his majesty and glory; and, lastly, that he only speaks of what is laid open to his view, and which he possesses himself. A person is much less struck with the eclat of titles which he has borne, as I may say, from his birth: the children of kings speak, without emotion, of sceptres and crowns ; and it is likewise the eternal Son alone of the living God who can speak so familiarly of the glory of God himself.

Behold, my brethren, seeing we participate with Jesus Christ in all his blessings, the right which he hath acquired for us, of considering God as our Father, of daring to call ourselves his children, and of loving rather than of fearing him. Nevertheless, we serve him like slaves and hirelings : we dread his chastisements ; but we are little affected by his love and his promises : his law, so righteous, so holy, has nothing pleasing for us ; it is a yoke which oppresses us, which excites our murmurs, and which we would soon free ourselves from were our transgressions against it to go unpunished : nothing is heard but complaints against the severity of its precepts, but contentions in order to support the propriety of those softenings which the world always mingles with their practice : in a word, were he not an avenging God we would never confess him ; and it is to his justice and to his chastisements alone that he is indebted for our respect and homages.

But the doctrine of Jesus Christ, with relation to men, whom he came to instruct, doth not less establish the truth of his divine birth. For I speak not here of the wisdom, the sanctity, and the sublimity of that doctrine : in it, every thing is worthy of reason, and of the soundest philosophy :
every

every thing is proportioned to the wretchedness and to the excellency of man, to his wants and to his exalted lot ; every thing there inspires contempt for perishable things, and the love of eternal riches : every thing there maintains good order, and the peace and tranquility of states : every thing there is grand, because every thing is true : the glory of the deeds is more real and more shining in the heart than the deeds themselves. The wise man of the gospel seeks, from his virtue here below, only the satisfaction of obeying God, who will one day amply recompense him for it, and he prefers the testimony of his own conscience to all the applauses of men : he is greater than the entire world, through his exalted faith ; and he is below the least of men, through the modesty of his sentiments. His virtue seeks not, in pride, the indemnity of its sufferings ; that is the first enemy which it attacks ; and, in that divine philosophy, the most heroical actions are nothing, from the moment that we count them as any thing ourselves : it considers glory as an error, prosperity as a misfortune, elevation as a precipice, afflictions as favours, the earth as a place of exilement, all that happens as a dream. What is this new language? What man prior to Jesus Christ had ever spoken in this manner? And if his disciples, merely in consequence of having announced this divine doctrine, were taken by a whole people for gods descended upon the earth, what worship shall they have have it in their power to refuse to him who is the Author of it, and in whose name they announce it?

But, let us leave these general reflections, and come to the more precise duties of that love and dependance which his doctrine exacts of men with regard to himself. He commands us to love him, as he commands us to love his Father: he insists that we dwell in him, that is to say, that we establish ourselves in him, that we seek our happiness in him, as in his Father; that we direct all our actions, all our thoughts, all our desires, that we direct ourselves to his glory, as to the glory of his Father; sins themselves are not remitted but to those who sincerely love him; and all the righteousnesses of the just, and the reconciliation of the sinner, are the effects of the love which we have for him. What is this man who comes to usurp the place of God in our hearts? Is a creature worthy of being loved for itself, and every noble and estimable quality which it may possess, is it not the sole gift of him who alone is worthy of all love?

What prophet prior to Jesus Christ had ever spoken thus to men: You shall love me; whatever you do, you shall do it for my glory. You shall love the Lord your God, said Moses to the children of Israel. Nothing is amiable in itself but what can bestow happiness upon us: now, no creature can be our happiness or our perfection: no creature, consequently, is worthy of being loved for itself; it would be an idolatry. Any man, who comes

comes to propose himself to men as the object of their love, is impious, and an impostor who seeks to usurp the most essential right of the supreme Being : he is a monster of pride and folly, who wants to erect altars to himself, even in hearts, the only sanctuary which the divinity had never yielded up to profane idols. The doctrine of Jesus Christ, that doctrine so divine, and so much admired even by the pagans, would no longer, in that case, be but a monstrous mixture of impiety, of presumption, and of folly, if, not being himself the God blessed in all ages, he had made that love which he exacted of his disciples, the most essential precept of his morality ; and it would be a ridiculous mark of ostentation in him, to have held himself out to men as a model of humility and modesty, while, in fact, he was carrying presumption and unlimited compliance to a degree far beyond all the proudest philosophers, who had never aspired to more than the esteem and the applauses of men.

Nor is this all : not only Jesus Christ insists that we love him, but he also exacts of men marks of the most disinterested and most heroical love. He insists that we love him more than our relations, than our friends, than our fortune, than our life, than the whole world, than ourselves ; that we suffer all for his sake, that we renounce all for him, that we shed, even to the last drop of our blood for him : whoever renders not to him these grand homages, is unworthy of him; whoever puts him in competition with any creature, or with himself, insults and dishonours him, and forfeits every pretension to his promises.
grand

What! my brethren, he is not satisfied, as the idols, and even the true God himself had appeared to be, with the sacrifices of goats and bulls? He carries his pretensions still further, and requires of man the sacrifice of himself; that he fly to gibbets; that he offer himself to death and to martyrdom for the glory of his name! But, if he be not the Master of our life, by what right doth he exact it of us? If our soul be not originally come from him, is it to him that we ought to return it? Is that regaining it, to have lost it for his sake? If he be not the Author of our being, do we not become sacrilegious and murderers when we sacrifice ourselves for his glory, and when we transfer to a creature, and to a simple messenger of God, the grand sacrifice of our being, solely destined to confess the sovereignty and the power of the eternal Maker, who hath drawn us from nothing? That Jesus Christ die himself, well and good, for the glory of God, and even that he exhort us to follow his example; many prophets before him had died for the Lord's sake, and had exhorted their disciples to walk in their steps. But that Jesus Christ, if he be not God himself, should order us to die for himself, should exact of men that last proof of love; that he should command us to offer up a life for him which we hold not of him ; is it possible that men should have ever existed upon the earth so vulgar and so stupid as to allow themselves to be led away by the extravagance of such a doctrine? Is it possible that maxims so ridiculous and so impious should have been able to triumph over the whole universe, to overthrow all sects, to recall all minds, and to prevail over every thing which had hitherto appeared exalted, either in learning, in doctrine, or in the wisdom of the earth? And, if we consider as barbarians those savage nations who make a sacrifice of themselves upon the tombs and ashes of their relations and friends, why should we view, in a more respectable light, those disciples of Jesus Christ who have sacrificed themselves for his sake? And shall not his religion be equally a religion of barbarity and of blood?
up

Yes, my brethren, the Agnes', the Lucias, the Agathas, those first martyrs of faith and of modesty, would then have sacrificed themselves to a mortal man? And, in preferring to shed their blood rather than to bend the knee before vain idols, they would have shunned one idolatry only in order to fall into another more condemnable, in dying for Jesus Christ? The generous avowers of faith would then have been only a set of desperate and fanatical men, who, like madmen, had run to death? The tradition of the martyrs would then be no longer but the list of an impious and bloody scene?

scene? The tyrants and persecutors would then have been the defenders of righteousness, and of the glory of the divinity? Christianity itself a sacrilegious and profane sect? The human race would then have totally erred? And the blood of the martyrs, far from having been the seed of believers, would have answered the sole purpose of inundating the whole universe with superstition and idolatry? O God! can the ear of man listen to such blasphemies without horror? And what more is necessary to overthrow unbelief than to shew it to itself?

Such are our first duties towards Jesus Christ; to sacrifice to him our inclinations, our friends, our relations, our fortune, our life itself, and, in a word, whatever may stand in the way of our salvation; it is to confess his divinity; it is to acknowledge that he alone can supply the place of all that we forsake for him, and render to us even more than we quit, by giving to us himself. It is he alone, says the apostle John, who contemns the world and all its pleasures, who confesses that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, because he thereby pronounces that Jesus Christ is greater than the world, more capable of rendering us happy, and consequently more worthy of our love.

But it is not sufficient to have considered the spirit of the ministry of Jesus Christ in his doctrine; it is necessary to consider it, secondly, in the special favours and blessings which the universe has received from him. He came to deliver all men from eternal death; from enemies of God, as they were, he hath rendered them his children: he hath secured to them the possession of the kingdom of God, and of immutable riches: he hath brought to them the knowledge of salvation and the doctrine of truth. These gifts, so magnificent, have not ended even with him; seated on the right hand of his Father, he still sheds them over our hearts; all our miseries still find their remedy in him: he nourishes us with his body; he washes us from our stains by continually applying to us the price of his blood; he forms pastors to conduct us; he inspires prophets to instruct us; he sanctifies righteous characters to animate us by their example; he is continually present in our hearts to comfort all their wants: man hath no passion which his grace doth not cure, no affliction which it doth not render pleasing, no power but what springs from him: in a word, he assures us himself that he is our way, our truth, our life, our righteousness, our redemption, our light. What new doctrine is this? Can a single man be the source of so many benefits to other men? Can the sovereign God, so jealous of his glory, attach us to a creature, by duties and ties so intimate and sacred, that we depend almost more upon that creature than upon himself? Would there be no danger that a man, become so beneficial and so necessary to other men, should at last become their idol?
received

That a man, author and dispenser of so many blessings, and who discharges, with regard to us, the office and all the functions of a god, should likewise, in a little time, occupy his place in our hearts?

For observe, my brethren, that it is gratitude alone which hath formerly made so many gods. Men, neglecting the Author of their being and of the universe, worshipped, at first, the air which enabled them to live, the earth which nourished them, the sun which gave them light, and the moon which presided over the night: such were their Cybeles, their Apollos, their Dianas. They worshipped those conquerors who had delivered them from their enemies; those benevolent and upright princes who had rendered their subjects happy, and the memory of their immortal reign; and Jupiter and Hercules were placed in the rank of gods, the one for the number of his victories, and the other in consequence of the happiness and tranquility of his reign: in the ages of superstition and credulity, men knew no other gods than those who were serviceable to them. And such is the character of man; his worship is but his love and his gratitude.

Now, what man hath ever benefited mankind so much as Jesus Christ? Recollect all that the pagan ages have told us of the history of their gods, and see if they believed themselves indebted to them what unbelief itself acknowledges, with the holy books, the world to be indebted to Jesus Christ.

To some they thought themselves indebted for favourable winds and a fortunate navigation ; to others for the fertility of seasons ; to their Mars for success in battle ; to their Janus for the peace and the tranquillity of the people ; to Esculapius for their health. But what are these weak benefits, if you compare them to those which Jesus Christ hath showered upon the earth ? He hath brought to it an eternal peace, a lasting happiness, righteousness and truth ; he hath made of it a new world and a new earth ; he hath not loaded a single people with his benefits, he hath loaded all nations, the whole universe ; and what is more, he hath become our benefactor only by suffering as our victim. What could he do more exalted or more noble for the earth ? If gratitude hath made gods, could Jesus Christ fail to find worshippers among men ? And, were it possible that any excess could take place in our love and in our gratitude to him, was it at all proper that we should be so deeply indebted to him ?

Again, if Jesus Christ, in dying, had informed his disciples that to the Lord alone they were indebted for so many benefits, that he himself had been merely the instrument, and not the author and source of all these special favours, and that they ought, consequently, to forget him, and to render to God that glory which was due to him alone : but very differently than with such instructions both Jesus Christ terminate his wonders and his ministry.

ministry. He not only requires that his disciples forget him not, and that they do not cease, even after his death, to hope in him ; but, on the point of quitting them, he assures them that, even to the consummation of time, he will be present with them ; he promises still more than he hath already bestowed upon them, and attaches them for ever to himself by indissoluble and immortal ties.

In effect, the promises which, in that last moment, he makes to them, are still more astonishing than all the favours he had granted to them during his life. In the first place, he promises to them the consoling Spirit, which he calls the Spirit of his Father : that Spirit of the truth which the world cannot receive ; that Spirit of energy which was to form the martyrs ; that Spirit of intelligence which was to enlighten the prophets ; that Spirit of wisdom which was to conduct the pastors ; that Spirit of peace and of charity which, of all believers, was to make only one heart and one soul. What right hath Jesus Christ over the Spirit of God, to dispose of it at his pleasure, and to promise it to men, if it be not his own Spirit ? Elijah, ascending to heaven, looks upon it as a thing hardly possible to promise to Eliseus, individually, his twofold spirit of zeal and prophecy : how far was he from promising to him the eternal Spirit of the heavenly Father, that Spirit of liberty which agitates where he thinks fit ! Nevertheless, the promises of Jesus Christ are accomplished ;
scarcely

scarcely hath he ascended to heaven when the Spirit of God descends upon the disciples; the illiterate become at once more learned than all the sages and philosophers; the weak more powerful than the tyrants; the foolish, according to the world, more prudent than all the wisdom of the age. New men, animated with a new Spirit, appear upon the earth; they attract all to walk in their steps; they change the face of the universe; and, even to the end of ages, shall that Spirit animate his church, form righteous souls, overthrow the unbelieving, console his disciples, sustain them amid persecutions and disgraces, and shall bear witness in the bottom of their heart that they are children of God, and that they are entitled, through that august title, to more real and more solid riches than all those of which the world can ever despoil them.

Secondly, Jesus Christ promises to his disciples the keys of heaven and of hell, and the power of remitting sins. What! my brethren, the Jews are deeply offended when he pretends to remit them himself, and when he seems to attribute to himself a power reserved to God alone; but, how will all nations of the earth be scandalised when they shall read, in his gospel, that he hath even delegated this power to his disciples? And, if he be not God, hath the mind of man ever imagined such an instance of temerity and folly? What right, in effect, hath he over consciences, to bind

or

or to unbind them at his pleasure. and to transfer to weak men a power which he himself could not exercise without blasphemy ?

Thirdly, But this is not all ; he promises to his disciples the gift likewise of miracles ; that, in his name, they should raise up the dead ; that they should restore sight to the blind, health to the sick, and speech to the dumb ; that they should be masters of all nature. Moses promises not to his disciples the gifts with which the Lord had favoured him : he is sensible that the power is not his own, and that the Lord alone can bestow it on whomsoever he may think fit. Thus, after his death, when Joshua arrests the sun in the middle of his course, in order to complete the victory over the enemies of the people of God, it is not in the name of Moses that he commands that the sun should stand still ; it is not of him that he holds the power of making even the stars obedient to him ; when he wishes to exercise it, it is not to him that he addresses himself : but the disciples of Jesus Christ can operate nothing but in the name of their Master ; it is in his name that they raise up the dead and make the lame to walk ; and, without the assistance of that divine name, they are equally weak as the rest of men. The ministry and the power of Moses terminate with his life ; the ministry and the power of Jesus Christ only begin, as I may say, after his death, and we are assured that his reign is to be eternal.

What

What more shall I say? He promises to his disciples the conversion of the universe, the triumph of the cross, the compliance of all the nations of the earth, of philosophers, of Cæsars, of tyrants; and that his gospel shall be received by the whole world: but, doth he hold the hearts of all men in his hands thus to answer for a change of which the world had hitherto had no example? You will, no doubt, tell us, that God layeth open the future to his servant. But you are mistaken: if he be not God, he is not even a prophet; his predictions are dreams and chimeras: it is a false spirit which seduces him, and which is concerned in his knowledge of the future, and the sequel hath belied the truth of his promises: he prophesies that all nations, seated under the shadow of death, shall open their eyes to the light; and he sees not that they are on the point of falling into a more criminal blindness in worshipping him: he prophesies that his Father shall be glorified, and that his gospel shall every where form to him worshippers in spirit and in truth; and he sees not that men are going for ever to dishonour him, in placing upon an equality with him, even to the end of ages, that Jesus who ought to have been considered only as his servant and prophet: he prophesies that idols shall be overthrown; and he sees not that he himself shall occupy their place: he prophesies that he will form to himself an holy people of every tongue and of every tribe; and he sees not that he

he comes only to form a new people of idolaters of every nation, who shall place him in the temple as the living God ; whose actions, worship, and homages shall all be directed to him ; who shall do all for his glory ; who shall depend solely upon him, live only for and through him, and have neither force nor energy but what they receive from him : in a word, who shall worship him, who shall love him a thousand times more spiritually, more intimately, and more universally, than ever the pagans had worshipped their idols. This, then, is not even a prophet ; and his relations, according to the flesh, are guilty of no blasphemy when they say “ he is beside himself,” and that he bestows, on the dreams of an heated imagination, all the weight and reality of revelations and mysteries.

Behold to what unbelief conducts. Overturn the foundation, which is the Lord Jesus, eternal Son of the living God, and the whole edifice tumbles in pieces : take away the grand mystery of piety, and all the religion is but a dream : deny the divinity of Jesus Christ, and you cut off, from the doctrine of Christians, all the merit of faith, all the consolation of hope, all the motives of charity. Thus, with what zeal did not the first disciples of the gospel oppose those impious men who, from that time, ventured to attack the glory of their Master’s divinity ? They well knew that it was striking at the heart of their religion ; that it was ravishing from them the only alleviation of their their

their persecutions and sufferings, all confidence in the promises to come, and all the dignity and grandeur of their pretensions; and that, that principle once overthrown, the whole religion dissipated in smoke, and was no longer but a human doctrine and the sect of a mortal man, who, like all the other chiefs, had left nothing but his name to his disciples.

Thus, the pagans themselves then reproached the Christians with rendering divine honours to their Christ. Pliny, a Roman proconsul celebrated for his works, giving an account to the emperor Trajan of their morals and doctrine; after being forced to confess that the Christians were pious, innocent, and upright men, and that they assembled before the rising of the sun, not to concert the commission of crimes, or to disturb the peace of the empire, but to live in piety and righteousness, to detest frauds, adulteries, and even the coveting of the wealth of others; he only reproaches them with chaunting hymns in honour of their Christ; and of rendering to him the same homages as to a god. Now, if these first believers had not rendered divine honours to Jesus Christ, they would have justified themselves against that calumny; they would have rejected that scandal from their religion, almost the only one which shocked the zeal of the Jews and the wisdom of the Gentiles: they would openly have said: We do not worship Jesus Christ; for we know better than to transfer to a creature that honour and worship which are due to God alone. Nevertheless, they make no reply to this accusation. Their apologists refute all the other calumnies with which the pagans endeavoured to blacken their doctrine; they clear up and overthrow the slightest accusations; and their apologies, addressed to the senate, attract to them even the admiration of Rome, and impose silence on their enemies. And, upon the accusation of idolatry towards Jesus Christ, which should be the most crying and the most horrible; upon the reproach of worshipping a crucified person, which was the most likely to discredit them, and which ought indeed to have been the most grievous to men so holy, so declared against idolatry, and so jealous of the glory of God, they are totally silent; and, far from defending themselves, they even justify the accusation by their silence: What do I say, by their silence? They authorise it by their language in professing to suffer for his name, in dying for him, in confessing him before the tyrants, in joyfully expiring upon gibbets, in the sweet expectation of going to enjoy him, and of receiving, in his bosom, a more immortal life than that which they had lost for his glory. They suffered martyrdom rather than bend to the statue of the Cæsars, rather than allow their pagan friends, through a human compassion, and to save them from torture, to falsely attest, before the magistrates, that they had had offered incense to the idols, and they would have submitted to the accusation of paying divine honours to Jesus Christ, without any attempt to destroy the imputation? Ah! they would have proclaimed the contrary from the house tops; they would have exposed themselves even to death, rather than to have given room to so hateful and so execrable a suspicion. What can unbelief oppose to this? And, if it be an error to equal Jesus Christ to God, it is an error which has been born with the church, and upon which the whole structure hath been reared; which has formed so many martyrs, and converted the whole universe.

had

But what fruit, my brethren, are we to draw from this discourse? That Jesus Christ is the grand object of Christian piety. Nevertheless, scarcely do we know Jesus Christ: we never consider that all the other practices of piety are, as I may say, arbitrary; but, that this is the ground-work of faith and of salvation; that this is pure and sincere piety; that, continually to meditate upon Jesus Christ, to have recourse to him, to nourish ourselves with his doctrine, to enter into the spirit of his mysteries, to study his actions, to count solely upon the merit of his blood and of his sacrifice, is the only true knowledge, and the most essential duty of the believer. Remember then, my brethren, that piety towards Jesus Christ is the cordial spirit of the Christian religion; that nothing is solid but what you shall build upon that foundation;

tion; and that the principal homage which he expects of you is, that you become like him, and that his life be the model of your own, in order that, through your resemblance to him, you may be included in the number of those who shall be partakers of his glory.

SER-

S E R M O N V I I I .

ON THE RESURRECTION OF LAZARUS.

JOHN xi. 34.

Come and see.

THE most hardened sinner could never submit to the horror of his situation, were he able to see and to know himself such as he is. A foul, grown old in guilt, is only bearable to itself, because that the same passion, from which all his miseries spring, conceals them from him, and that his disorder is, at the same time, both the weapon which inflicts the wound, and the fatal bandage which hides it from the eyes of the patient.

Behold wherefore the church, in order to lay the sinner open to himself during this time of penitence, almost continually displays to us, under various various images, the deplorable state of a soul who has grown old in his iniquity : one while under the figure of a paralytic young man ; that is, to mark to us the insensibility and fatal ease which always follow habitual guilt : another, under the symbol of a prodigal reduced to feed with the vilest animals ; and, under these traits, it wishes to make us feel his abasement and his infamy : again, under the image of a person born blind ; and that is in order to paint to us the depth and the horror of his blindness : and, lastly, under the parable of a deaf and dumb person possessed with a devil ; and that is, more animatedly to figure to us the subjection under which habitual guilt holds all the powers of an unfortunate soul.

To day, in order, as it were, to assemble all these traits under a single image still more terrible and striking, the church proposes to us Lazarus in the tomb, dead for four days, emitting stench and infection, bound hand and foot, his face covered with a napkin, and exciting only horror even in those whom affection and blood had most closely united to him in life.

Come then and see, you, my dear hearer, who live, for so many years past, under the shameful yoke of dissipation, and who are insensible to the misery of your situation. Approach this tomb which the voice of Jesus Christ is now to open before your eyes ; and, in that spectacle of infection and putrefaction, behold the true picture of your soul. You

fly

fly to profane spectacles, in order to see your passions represented under pleasing and deceitful colours: approach, and see them expressed here such as they are: come, and, in that infectious and stinking carcase, behold what you are in the sight of God, and how much your situation is worthy of your tears.

But, in exposing here only the horrible situation of a soul who lives in disorder, lest I trouble and discourage, without holding out to him a hand in order to assist him in quitting that abyfs; that I may omit nothing of our gospel, I shall divide it into three reflections: in the first, you will see how shocking and deplorable is the situation of a soul who lives in habitual irregularity; in the second, I shall shew to you the means by which he may quit it; and, in the third, what the motives are which determine Jesus Christ to operate the miracle of his resurrection and deliverance. O my God! let thine all-powerful voice be now heard by those unfortunate souls who sleep in the darkness and shadow of death; command these withered bones once more to be animated, and to recover that light and that life of grace which they have lost.

REFLECTION I. I remark, at first, three principal circumstances in the deplorable spectacle which Lazarus, dead and buried, offers to our eyes. 1stly, Already become a mass of worms and corruption, he spreads infection and stench: and behold the profound

profound corruption of a soul in habitual sin. 2dly, A gloomy napkin covers his eyes and his face: and behold the fatal blindness of a soul in habitual sin. Lastly, He appears in the tomb bound hand and foot: and behold the melancholy subjection of a soul in habitual sin. Now, it is that profound corruption, that fatal blindness, and that melancholy servitude, typified in the spectacle of Lazarus, dead and buried, which precisely form all the horror and all the wretchedness of a soul long dead in the eyes of God.

In the first place, there is not a more natural image of a soul grown old in iniquity, than that of a carcase already a prey to worms and putrefaction. Thus the holy books every where represent the state of sin under the idea of a shocking death; and it seems as if the Spirit of God had found that melancholy image the most calculated to give us, at least, a glimpse of all the deformity of a soul in which sin dwells:

Now, two effects are produced on the body by death: it deprives it of life; it afterwards alters all its features, and corrupts all its members. It deprives it of life; in the same manner it is that sin begins to disfigure the beauty of the soul. For, God is the life of our souls, the light of our minds, and the spring, as I may say, of our hearts. Our righteousness, our wisdom, our truth, are only the union of a righteous, wise, and true God with our soul: all our virtues are only the different influences ences of his Spirit which dwells within us : it is he who exciteth our good desires, who formeth our holy thoughts, who produceth our pure lights, who operateth our righteous propensities ; inasmuch that all the spiritual and supernatural life of our soul is only, as the apostle speaks, the life of God within us.

Now, by a single sin that life ceases, that light is extinguished, that spirit withdraws, all these springs are suspended. Thus the soul, without God, is a soul without life, without motion, light, truth, righteousness, or charity ; it is no longer but a chaos, a dead body : its life is no longer but an imaginary and chimerical life ; and, like those inanimate substances set in motion by a foreign influence, it seems to live and to act ; but “ it is “ dead while living.”

Behold the first degree of death which every sin that separates a soul from God introduces into it ; but habitual sin, like inveterate death, goes further. Thus, Lazarus not only is without life in the tomb, but, having been there for four days, the corruption of his body begins to spread infection. For although the first sin, which causes the loss of grace, leave us, in the eyes of God, without life and without motion ; yet we may say, that certain impressions of the Holy Spirit, certain seeds of spiritual life, certain means of recovering the grace lost, still remain to us. Faith is not yet extinguished ; the feelings of virtue not yet effaced ; a fense of the truths of falvation not yet loft : it is a dead body in truth ; but, life being only juft withdrawn, it ftill preferves, I know not what, of marks of warmth, which feem to fpring from fome remain of life. But, in proportion as the foul remains in death, and perfeveres in guilt, grace withdraws ; all extinguifhes, all changes, all corrupts, and its corruption becomes univerfal.

I fay univerfal ; yes, my brethren, all changes, all corrupts in the foul, through a continuance of diforder ; the gifts of nature, gentlenefs, rectitude, humanity, modefty, even the mental talents ; the bleffings of grace, the feelings of religion, the remorse of confcience, the terrors of faith, and faith itfelf ; the corruption penetrates all, and changes, into putrefaction and a fpectacle of horror, both the gifts of heaven and the bleffings of the earth : nothing remains in its original fituation ; the lovelieft features are thofe which become the moft hideous and the moft undiftinguifhable ; the charms of wit become the feafoning of debauchery and the paffions ; feelings of religion are changed into free-thinking ; fuperiority of knowledge into pride, and a vain and fhocking philofophy ; nobility of mind is no longer but a boundlefs ambition ; generofity and tendernefs of heart but a yielding to the fway of impure and profane connections ; the principles of glory and honour, handed down to us with the blood of our anceftors, but a vain oftentation, and the fource of all our hatreds and animofities ; our rank,

rank, our elevation, the cause of our envies and mean jealousies; lastly, our riches and our prosperity, the fatal instrument of all our crimes.

But the corruption is not confined to the sinner alone; a dead body cannot be long concealed without a smell of death being spread around; it is impossible to live long in debauchery without the smell of a bad life making itself felt. In vain is every precaution employed to conceal the ignominy of a disorderly life; in vain is the sepulchre, full of putrefaction and infection, externally whitened and embellished, the stench spreads; guilt, sooner or later, betrays itself; a black and infectious air always proceeds from that profane fire which, with so much care, was concealed. A disorderly life betrays itself in a thousand ways; the public, at last undeceived, opens its eyes, and the more their character becomes blown, the more they discover themselves; they become accustomed to their shame; they become weary of constraint and decency: that guilt, which is only to be purchased with attention and arrangements, appears too dear; they unmask themselves; they throw off that remainder of restraint and modesty which made us still cautious of the eyes of men; they wish to riot in disorder, without precaution or care; and, then, servants, friends, connections, the city and country, all feel the infection of their irregularities and example. Our rank our elevation, no longer serve but to render more striking and more durable the scandal of our debaucheries : in a thousand places our excesses serve as a model : the view of our manners perhaps strengthens, in secret, consciences whom guilt still rendered uneasy ; perhaps they even cite us, and make use of our example in seducing innocence, and in conquering a still timorous modesty : and, even after our death, the fame of our debaucheries shall stain the history of men ; shall perhaps embellish lascivious tales ; and, long after our day, in ages yet to come, the remembrance of our crimes shall still be an occasion and a source of guilt.
and

Lastly, But I would not dare to enlarge here, the corruption which habitual guilt sheds through the whole interior of the sinner is so universal, that even his body is infected : debauchery leaves the shameful marks of his irregularities on his flesh : the infection of his soul often extends even to a body which he has made subservient to ignominy. He says, in advance to corruption, like Job, “ thou art my father ; and to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister :” the corruption of his body is a shocking picture of that of his soul.

Great God ! can I then flatter myself that thou wilt yet cast upon me some looks of compassion ! Wilt thou not groan at the sight of that mass of crimes and putrefaction which my soul presents to thine eyes, as thou now groanest in the spirit over the tomb of Lazarus ? Ah ! avert thine holy eyes from the spectacle of my profound wretchedness ; but, let me no more turn away from it myself, and let me be enabled to view myself with all that horror which my situation deserves: tear afunder the veil which hides me from myself; my evils shall, in part, be done away from the moment that I shall be able to see and to know them.
let

And behold the second circumstance of the deplorable situation of Lazarus; a mournful cloth covers his face: that is the profound blindness which forms the second character of habitual sin.

I confess that every sin is an error which makes us mistake evil for good; it is a false judgment which makes us seek, in the creature, that ease, grandeur, and independence which we can find in God alone: it is a mist which hides order, truth, and righteousness from our eyes, and, in their place, substitutes vain phantoms. Nevertheless, a first falling off from God does not altogether extinguish our lights; nor is it always productive of total darkness. It is true that the spirit of God, source of all light, retires, and no longer dwells within us; but some traces of light are still left in the soul: thus, though the sun be already withdrawn from our hemisphere, yet certain rays of his light still tinge the sky, and form, as it were, an imperfect day; it is only in proportion as he sinks that gloom gains, and the darkness of night at last prevails. In the same manner, in proportion as sin degenerates into habit, the light of God retires, darkness

darkness gains, and the profound night of total blindness at last arrives.

And then all becomes occasion of error to the criminal soul; all changes its aspect to his eyes; the most shameful passions no longer appear but as weaknesses; the most criminal attachments but sympathies brought with us into the world and inherent to our hearts; the excesses of the table but innocent pleasures of society; revenge but a just sense of injury; licentious and impious conversations but lively and agreeable follies; the blackest defamation but a customary language of which none but weak and timid minds can make a scruple; the laws of the church but old-fashioned customs; the severity of God's judgments but absurd declamations which equally disgrace his goodness and mercy; death in sin, inevitable consequence of a criminal life, mere predictions, in which there is more of zeal than of truth, and refuted by the confidence which a return to God, previous to that last moment, promises to us; lastly, heaven, the earth, hell, all creatures, religion, crimes, virtues, good and evil, things present and to come, all change their aspect to the eyes of a soul who lives in habitual guilt; all shew themselves under false appearances; his whole life is no longer but a delusion and a continued error. Alas! could you tear away the fatal veil which covers your eyes, like those of Lazarus, and behold hold yourself, like him, buried in darkness; all covered with putrefaction, and spreading around infection and a smell of death! But now, says our Saviour, all these things are hid from thine eyes; you see in yourself only the embellishments and the pompous externals of the fatal tomb in which you drag on in sin; your rank, your birth, your talents, your dignities, your titles; that is to say, the trophies and the ornaments which the vanity of men has there raised up; but, remove the stone which covers that place of horror; look within, judge not of yourself from these pompous outwards, which serve only to embellish your carcase; see what, in the eyes of God, you are; and, if the corruption and the profound blindness of your soul touch you not, let its slavery at least rouse and recall you to yourself.

Last circumstance of the situation of Lazarus dead and buried; he was bound hand and foot; and behold the image of the wretched slavery of a soul long under the dominion of sin.

Yes, my brethren, in vain does the world decry a Christian life as a life of subjection and slavery; the reign of righteousness is a reign of liberty; the soul, faithful and submissive to God, becomes master over all creatures; the just man is above all, because he is unconnected with all; he is master of the world, because he despises the world; he is dependent neither on his masters, because he only serves them for God; nor on his friends, because he only loves them according to the order of charity and of righteousness; nor on his inferiors, because he exacts from them no iniquitous compliance; nor on his fortune, because he rather dreads it; nor on the judgments of men, because he dreads those of God alone; nor on events, because he considers them all as in the order of providence; nor even on his passions, because the charity which is within him is their rule and measure. The just man alone, then, enjoys a perfect liberty: superior to the world, to himself, to all creatures, to all events, he begins, even in this life, to reign with Jesus Christ; all is below him, while he is himself inferior to God alone.
 he

But the sinner, who seems to live without either rule or restraint, is, however, a vile slave; he is dependant on all, on his body, on his propensities, on his caprices, on his passions, on his fortune, on his masters, on his friends, on his enemies, on his rivals, on all surrounding creatures; so many gods to which love or fear subject him; so many idols which multiply his slavery, while he thinks himself more free by casting off that obedience which he owes to God alone; he multiplies his masters, by refusing submission to him alone who renders free those who serve him, and who gives to his servants dominion over the world and over every thing which the world contains.

You often complain, my dear hearer, of the hardships of virtue; you dread a Christian life, as a life of subjection and sorrow : but what, in it, could you find so gloomy as you experience in debauchery? Ah! If you durst complain of the bitterness and of the tyranny of the passions; if you durst confess the troubles, the disgusts, the frenzies, the anxieties of your soul; if you were candid on the gloomy transactions of your heart, there is no lot but what would appear preferable to your own; but you disguise the inquietudes of guilt which you feel; and you exaggerate the hardships of virtue which you have never known. But, in order to hold out to you an assisting hand, let us continue the history of our gospel, and let us see, in the resurrection of Lazarus, what are the means offered to you, by the goodness of God, of quitting so deplorable a situation.
life

REFLECTION II. The power of God, says the apostle, is not less conspicuous in the conversion of sinners than in raising up the dead; and the same supernatural power which wrought upon Jesus Christ to deliver him from the tomb, ought to operate upon the soul long dead in sin, in order to recall it to the life of grace. I find there only this difference, that the almighty voice of God meets no resistance from the body which he revives and recalls to life; on the contrary, the soul, dead and corrupted, as I may say, through the long duration of guilt, seems to retain a remainder of strength and motion only to oppose that powerful voice which is heard even in the abyss in which it is plunged, and which rebounds for the purpose of restoring it to light and life. Nevertheless, however difficult may be the conversion of a soul of this description, and however rare such examples may be, the spirit of God, in order to teach us never to despair of divine mercy when we sincerely wish to quit the ways of iniquity, points out to us at present, in the resurrection of Lazarus, the means of accomplishing it.

The first is, confidence in Jesus Christ : Lord, says Mary the sister of Lazarus, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died ; but I know that, even now, whatsoever thou wilt ask of God, God will give it thee. I am the resurrection and the life, said Jesus unto her ; believest thou this ? Yes, Lord, said she, I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world. It is through this that the miracle of raising up Lazarus begins, viz. the perfect confidence that Jesus Christ is able to deliver him from death and corruption.

For, my brethren, the delusion continually employed by the demon, in order to render our desires of conversion unavailing, and to counteract their progress, is that of despondency and mistrust ; he warmly retraces to our imagination the horrors of an entire life of guilt : he says to us, in secret, that which the sisters of Lazarus say to Jesus Christ, though in a different sense ; that we ought, at a much earlier period, to have checked our career ; that it is now impossible, when so far advanced, to return; that the time for attempting a change is now past; and that the virulency and age of our wounds no longer admit a resource. Upon this they abandon themselves to languor and indolence; and, after having incensed the righteousness of God through our debaucheries, we insult his mercy through the excess of our mistrust.
that

I confess that a soul, long dead in sin, must suffer much in returning to God; that it is difficult, after so many years of dissipation, to form to one's self a new heart and new inclinations; and that is even fit, that the obstacles, the sufferings, and the difficulties which always attend the conversion of souls of that description, should make great sinners feel how dreadful it is to have been almost a whole life-time removed from God.

But I say that, from the moment a truly contrite soul wishes to return to him, his wounds however virulent or old, ought no longer to alarm his confidence: I say that his wretchedness ought to increase his compunction but not his despondency: I say that the first step of his penitence ought to be that of adoring Jesus Christ as the resurrection and the life; a secret confidence that our wants are always less than his mercies; a firm persuasion that the blood of Jesus Christ is more powerful in washing out our stains than our corruption can be in contracting them: I say that, the fewer resources of strength a criminal soul may find find in himself, the more ought he to expect from him who taketh delight in rearing up the work of grace upon the nothingness of nature; and that the more he is inwardly opposed to grace, the more does he, in one sense, become an object worthy of divine power and mercy, for God willeth that all good shall evidently appear as coming from above, and that man shall attribute nothing to himself.

And in effect, my dear hearer, whatever may the horror of your past crimes be, the Lord will not long refuse you grace, from the moment that he hath inspired you with the desire and the resolution of asking it. It is written in Judges, that the father of Samson, terrified by the apparition of the angel of the Lord, who, after announcing to him the birth of a son, commanded him to offer up a sacrifice, and then, like a devouring fire, consumed the victim and the pile, and vanished from his sight; that, terrified, I say, at that spectacle, he was convinced that both himself and his wife were to be struck with death because they had seen the Lord. But his wife, holy and enlightened, condemned his mistrust. If the Lord, said she to him, wished to destroy us, he would not have made fire from heaven to descend on our sacrifice: he would not have accepted it from our hands; he would not have discovered to us his secrets and his wonders, and what we had hitherto been ignorant of.

And

And behold what I now answer to you. You believe your death and your destruction to be inevitable ; the state of your conscience discourages you ; in vain do sparks of grace and of light fall upon your heart ; in vain do they touch you, solicit you, and almost gain the point of consuming the sacrifice of your passions ; you persuade yourself that you are lost beyond resource. But, if the Lord wished to abandon and to destroy you, he would not make fire from heaven to descend upon your heart ; he would not light up within you holy desires and sentiments of penitence : if he wished to let you die in the blindness of your passions, he would not manifest to you the truths of salvation ; he would not open your eyes on those miseries to come, which you prepare for yourself. Besides, how do you know if Jesus Christ has not permitted your falling into such a deplorable state for the purpose of making a prodigy of your conversion an incitement to the conversion of your brethren ? How do you know if his mercy has not rendered your passions so notorious, in order that thousands of sinners, witnesses of your errors, despair not of conversion, and be inflamed at the sight of your penitence ? How do you know if your crimes, and even your scandals, have not entered into the designs of God's goodness with regard to your brethren ; and if your situation, which seems hopeless like that of Lazarus, is not rather an occasion caſion of manifeſting God's glory than a preſage of death to you ?

When grace recalls a common finner, the fruit of his converſion is limited to himſelf ; but, when it ſingles out a grand finner, a Lazarus, long dead and corrupted ; ah ! the deſigns of its mercy are then much more extenſive : in one change it prepares a thouſand to come : it raiſes up a thouſand-choſen out of one : and the crimes of a finner become the ſeed of a thouſand juſt. You give way to deſpondency in feeling the extremity of your wretchedneſs : but it is perhaps that very extremity which draws you nearer to the happy moment of your converſion, and which the goodneſs of God has reſerved for you, that you might be a public monument of the exceſs of his mercies towards the greateſt finners. Only believe, as Jeſus Chriſt ſaid to the ſiſters of Lazarus, and you ſhall ſee the glory of God ; you ſhall ſee your relations, your friends, your inferiors, and even the accomplices of your debaucheries, become imitators of your penitence ; you ſhall ſee the moſt hopeleſs ſouls ſighing after the happineſs of your new life ; and the world itſelf forced to render glory to God, and, in recalling your paſt errors, to admire the prodigy of your preſent lot. Take, even from your wretchedneſs itſelf, new motives of confidence : bleſs, in advance, the merciful wiſdom of that Being, who, even from your paſſions, ſhall know how to extract advantages to his glory ; every

very thing co-operates towards the falvation of his chofen, and he permitteth great exceffes only in order to operate great mercies. God ever witheth the falvation of his creature; and, from the moment that we form a wifh of returning to him, our only dread ought to be, not that his juftice reject us, but left our intention be not fincere.

And the fureft proof of our fincerity is the abfenting ourfelves from every occafion which may place an obftacle to our refurrection and our deliverance; obftacle, figured by the ftone which fhut up the mouth of Lazarus's tomb, and which Jefus Chrift orders to be removed before he begins to operate the miracle of his refurrection; remove the ftone. Second mean, marked in our gofpel.

In effect, every day fhews finners, who, tired of diforder, wifh to return to God, but who cannot prevail upon themfelves to quit thofe objécts, thofe places, thofe fituations, and thofe rocks, which have been the caufe of their removal from him: they vainly perfuade themfelves that they fhall be able to extinguifh their paffions, to terminate a diforderly life; in a word, to rife from the dead, without removing the ftone, they even make fome efforts; they addrefs themfelves to men of God; they adopt meafures for a change; but, it is of thofe meafures which, not removing the dangers, do not, in the fmalleft degree, forward their fafety; and thus their whole life forrowfully paffes away

away in detesting their chains, and in the utter inability of breaking them asunder.

Whence comes this, my brethren? It is that the passions begin to weaken only after the removal of such objects as have lighted them up; it is absurd to suppose that the heart can change while every thing around us continues, with regard to us, the same; you would become chaste, yet you live in the midst of the dangers, the connections, the familiarities, the pleasures, which have a thousand times corrupted your heart; you would wish to reflect seriously on your eternity, and to place some interval betwixt life and death, yet you are unwilling to place any betwixt death and those debaucheries which prevent you from reflecting on your salvation; and, in the midst of agitations, pleasures, trifles, and worldly expectations, from which, on no account, will you abate, you expect that the inclination and relish for a Christian life will come to you unsought-for: you would that your heart form new propensities, surrounded by every thing which nourishes and fortifies the old; and that the lamp of faith and grace blaze up in the midst of winds and tempests, it which, even in the sanctuary, so often extinguishes through want of oil and nourishment, and, to lukewarm and retired souls, converts into a danger even the safety of their retreat.

You come, after that, to tell us that good-will is not wanting; that the moment is not yet come.

How,

How, indeed, should it come in the midst of every thing that repels it? But what is that good-will, shut up within you, which has never any consequence, which never leads to any thing real, and never seriously adopts a single measure towards a change? That is to say, that you would wish to change could it be done for nothing; you would wish to work out your salvation by the same conduct which occasions your destruction; you would wish that the same manners which have separated your heart from God should approach you to him; and that what has hitherto been the cause of your ruin should itself become the way and the mean of your salvation. Begin by removing the occasions which so often have been, and still continue to be, the rock of your innocence; remove the stone which shuts up the entry of grace to your soul; after that you shall be entitled to demand of God the completion of his work in you. Then, separated from those objects which nourished iniquitous passions within you, you shall have it in your power to say to him, It is thy part now, O my God! to change my heart; to thee I have sacrificed every attachment which might still fetter it; I have removed all the rocks upon which my weakness might still have split; as much as in me lay, I have changed the outward man; thou alone, O Lord, canst change the heart; it depends upon thee now to complete what yet remains to be done, to break the invisible chains, to overcome all internal obstacles, and totally to triumph over my corruption : I have removed the fatal stone which prevented me from hearing thy voice ; let it now rebound, even through the abyſs in which I am ſtill buried ; command me to depart from that fatal tomb, that place of infection and putrefcence, but command me with that almighty word which makes itſelf to be heard even by the dead, and is to them a word of reſurrection and life ; give me in charge to thy diſciples, to be unloofed from thoſe chains which hold captive all the powers of my ſoul ; and let the miniſtry of thy church put the laſt ſeal to my reſurrection and my deliverance.

And behold, my brethren, the laſt mean held out in our goſpel. Immediately, on the removal of the ſtone, our Saviour cries, with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth ! Lazarus comes forth, ſtill bound hand and foot, and Jeſus Chriſt remits him to his diſciples to be unloofed.

Obſerve here that Jeſus Chriſt doth not order his diſciples to unloofe Lazarus till after he had entirely quitted the tomb. We muſt manifeſt ourſelves to the church, ſays an holy father, before we can, through its miniſtry, receive the bleſſing of our deliverance. Lazarus come forth, that is to ſay, continues that father, how long wilt thou remain concealed and buried inwardly in thy conſcience ? How long wilt thou conceal thine iniquity within thy breaſt ?

You

You undoubtedly are not ignorant, my brethren, that remission of our sins is only granted through the ministry of the church, and that it is necessary to lay open and to present our bonds to the piety of the ministers, who alone have authority to bind and to unbind on the earth; this is not upon what you require instruction. But, I say, that, in order that the conversion be solid and durable, we must, like Lazarus, shew ourselves quite out of the tomb. An ordinary confession is not the matter in question: an hardened sinner ought to go back even to his infancy; even to the birth of his passions; even to the youngest periods of his life, which have been the commencement of his crimes. Neither doubts nor obscurities must longer be left in the conscience, nor mists over the youthful manners, under pretence that they have already been revealed; a general manifestation is required, and whatever may hitherto have been done must be reckoned as nothing; every duty of religion, performed during a disorderly and worldly life, is even to be ranked among our crimes; the conscience must be considered as a chaos, into which no light has, as yet, penetrated, and over which all our fictitious and past penitence has spread only additional darkness.

For, alas! my brethren, a contrite soul, after returning from the errors of the world and the passions, ought to presume that, having to that period lived in criminal habits and propensities, every ry time the sacrament has been received in that state was only a profanation and a crime.

In the first place, because, having never felt real contrition for his errors, nor, consequently, any sincere desire to purge himself of them, the remedies of the church, far from having purified, have only completed his foulness, and rendered his disease more incurable.

2dly, Because he has never been known to himself; and, consequently, could never make himself known to the tribunal of his conscience. For, alas! the world, in the midst of which this soul has always lived, and in which he has ever thought and judged like it; the world, I say, finding reasonable and wise only its own maxims and manner of thinking, does it sufficiently know the holiness of the gospel, the obligations of faith, and the extent of duties, to be qualified to enter into the detail of those transgressions which faith condemns?

3dly, and lastly, Because that, even admitting he should have known all his wretchedness, never having had any real sorrow for it, he has never been qualified to make it known; for nothing but heartfelt sorrow can explain itself as it ought, or truly represent those evils which it feels and abhors; it must be a feeling heart that can make itself to be understood on the wounds and the sufferings of a heart itself. A sinner, full of a profane passion, expresses it much more eloquently, and with more animation; nothing is left unsaid of the foolish and deplorable sufferings he endures; he enters into all the windings of his heart, his jealousies, his fears, and his hopes. As the mind of man, says the apostle, alone knows what passes in man, so likewise it is only the heart which can know what passes in the heart. Contrition gives eyes to see, and words to express every thing; it has a language which nothing can counterfeit: thus, in vain may a worldly soul, still chained by the heart to all his disorders, come to accuse himself, he cannot be understood; without any absolute intention of concealing his wounds, he never exposes all their horror, because he neither feels nor is struck with them himself; his words always relish of the insensibility of his heart; and it is impossible that he should expose, in all their ugliness, deformities which he knows not, and which he still loves: he ought, therefore, to consider the whole period of his past life as a period of darkness and blindness, during which he has never viewed himself but with the eyes of flesh and blood; never judged but through the opinions of passion and self-love; never accused but in the language of error and impenitence; never exhibited himself but in a false and imperfect light. It is not enough to have removed the stone from the tomb; the criminal soul must come forth from it himself, that he may exhibit himself, as I may say, in open day; that he may manifest his whole life; and that, from his earliest years even to the blessed hour of his deliverance, nothing be concealed from the eyes of the ministers ready to unbind him.
and

nothing

But this step, you say, has difficulties which may be the occasion of casting trouble, embarrassment, and discouragement, through the conscience, and of suspending the resolution of a change of life. What! my brethren, you involve yourselves in discussions so arduous and so endless, for the purpose of clearing up your temporal concerns; and, in order to establish regularity and serenity in your conscience, and to leave nothing doubtful in the affair of your eternity, you would cry out from the moment that a few cares and investigations are required? How often do you proclaim, when a decisive step is in agitation which may determine the ruin or preservation of your fortune, that nothing must be neglected, nothing must be left to chance; that one's own eyes must look into every thing, that every thing must be cleared up, every thing fathomed even to the bottom, that you may have nothing afterwards wherewith to reproach yourselves; and this maxim, so reasonable when connected with fleeting and frivolous interests, should be less so when applied to the grand and only real interest, that of salvation?

Ah! my brethren, how poor are we in faith! And what have we, in this life, of more importance than the care of arranging that awful account which we have to render to the eternal Judge, and to the searcher of hearts and of thoughts? That is to say, the care of regulating our conscience, of dispelling its darkness, of purifying its stains, of clearing up its eternal interests, of confirming its hopes, of strengthening ourselves as much as the present condition permits, and making ourselves acquainted, as far as in our power, with its situation and its dispositions; and not to make our appearance before God like fools, unknown to ourselves, uncertain of what we are, and of what we must for ever be. Such are the means of conversion marked out to us in the miracle of raising up Lazarus: let us conclude the history of our gospel, and see what the motives are which determine Jesus Christ to operate it.

to

REFLECTION III. To enter at once into our subject, without losing sight of the consequence of the gospel; the first motive which our Saviour seems to have, in the resurrection of Lazarus, is that of drying up the tears, and rewarding the prayers and the piety of his sisters. Lord, said they to him, he whom thou lovest is sick: and behold the first motive which often determines Jesus Christ to operate the conversion of a great sinner; the tears and the prayers of those just souls who entreat it.

Yes, my brethren, whether it be that the Lord thereby wish to render virtue more respectable to sinners, by according favours to them only through the mediation of just souls: whether it be that he intend more closely to knit together his members, and to perfect them in unity and in charity, by rendering the ministry of the one useful and requisite to the other ; it is certain, that it is through the prayers of the good, and in their intercession, that the source of the conversion of the greatest sinners springs up. As all is done for the just in the church, says the apostle, so it may be said, that every thing is done through them ; and, as sinners are only endured in it to exercise their virtue, or to animate their vigilance, they are also recalled from their errors only to console their faith, and to reward their groanings and prayers.
and

To love just souls is a beginning, then, of righteousness to the greatest sinners ; it is a presage of virtue to respect it in those who practise it ; it is a prospect of conversion to seek the society of the good, to esteem their acquaintance, and to interest them in our salvation ; and, even admitting that our heart still groan under iniquitous bonds, and that attachment to the world and to pleasures still separate us from God, yet, from the moment that we begin to love his servants, we accomplish, as it were, the first step in his service. It seems as if our heart already becomes tired of its passions, from the moment that we take pleasure in the society of those who condemn them ; and that a relish for virtue is on the eve of springing up in us, from the moment that we take delight in those whom virtue alone renders amiable.

Besides,

Besides, the just, instructed by ourselves with regard to our weaknesses, keep them continually present before the Lord; they lament, before him, over those chains which still bind us to the world and to its amusements; they offer up to him some weak desires of virtue which we have intrusted to their charge, in order to induce his goodness to grant more fervent and more efficacious ones; they carry, even to the foot of the throne, some feeble essays towards good which they have noted in us, in order to obtain for us the perfection and plenitude of his mercy. More affected with our evils than for their own wants, they piously forget themselves, in order to snatch from destruction their brethren who are on the point of perishing before their eyes: they alone love us for ourselves, because they alone love in us but our salvation; the world may furnish sycophants, flatterers, social companions in dissipation, but virtue alone gives us friends.

And it is here that you who now listen to me, who, perhaps, like Mary, were formerly slaves of the world and the passions, and who, latterly, touched with grace, like her, quit no more the feet of the Lord; it is here that you ought to remember that, in future, one of the most important duties of your new life is, that of continually demanding, like the sister of Lazarus, from Jesus Christ, the resurrection of your brethren, the conversion of those unfortunate souls who have been accomplices in your criminal pleasures, and who still, under the dominion of death and sin, sorrowfully drag on their chains in the ways of the world and of error. You ought continually, in the bitterness of your heart, to be saying to Jesus Christ, like the sister of Lazarus: Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick; those souls to whom I have been a stumbling-block, and who have less offended thee than I, are still, however, in the shadow of death, and in the corruption of sin: and I enjoy a deliverance of which I was more unworthy than they! Ah! Lord, the delight I feel in appertaining to thee shall never be perfect while I behold my brethren thus miserably perishing before mine eyes: I shall but imperfectly enjoy the fruit of thy mercies, while thou refusest them to souls to whom I have myself been the fatal cause of their departure from righteousness: and I shall never think that my crimes are fully forgiven, while I see them existing in those sinners who have been removed from thee only through my example and my passions.

Not, my brethren, that you ought to place your whole dependence on the prayers of the good, or to expect from them alone a change of heart and the gift of penitence. For this is a very general illusion, and more especially among those who are high in the world: they suppose that, by respecting virtue, by shewing favour to the good, and by interesting them to solicit our conversion from God, our chains shall drop off of themselves without any effort on our part; they comfort themselves upon that remainder of faith and religion which renders virtue in others still dear and respectable to us; they give themselves credit for not having, as yet, reached that point of free-thinking and impiety, so common in the world, which makes virtue the public butt of its censures and derision. But, alas! my brethren, it availed nothing to king Jehu that he had publicly rendered honour to the holy man Jehonadab; his vices still subsisted with all that respect he had for the man of God. It availed nothing to Herod that he had honoured the piety of John the Baptist, and that he had even loved the holy freedom of his discourses: the deference which he had for the precursor left him still all the excess of his criminal passion. The honours which we pay to virtue attract aids to our weakness; but they do not justify our errors: the prayers of the good induce the Lord to pay more attention to our wants; but they do not render him more indulgent to our crimes: they obtain for us victory over the passions which we begin to detest; but not over those which we still love, and which we still continue to cherish: in a word, they assist our good desires; but they do not authorise our impenitence.
out

The miracle of raising up Lazarus teaches just souls, then, to solicit the conversion of their brethren; but the conversion and deliverance of their brethren likewise serve to animate their lukewarmness lukewarmness and slothfulness. Second motive which Jesus Christ proposes: he wishes, by the novelty of that prodigy, to arouse the faith of his disciples, still dormant and languishing.

And such is the fruit which Jesus Christ continually expects from the miracles of his grace: he operates before your eyes, you who have long walked in his ways, sudden and surprising conversions, in order, by the fervour and the zeal of these newly risen from the dead, to confound your lukewarmness and indolence. Yes, my brethren, nothing is more calculated to cover us with confusion, and to make us tremble over the infidelities which we still mingle with a cold and languishing piety, than the sight of a soul buried, but an instant ago, in the corruption of death and sin, and whose errors had perhaps inflated the vanity of our zeal, and served as a butt to the malignity of our censures; than the sight, I say, of such a soul, vivified, a moment after, by grace, freed from his chains, and boldly walking in the ways of God, more eager after mortification than formerly after pleasure; more removed from the world and its amusements than apparently he was once attached; scrupling to himself the most innocent recreations; allowing almost no bounds to the vivacity and transports of his penitence; and every day making rapid advances in piety: while we, after many years of piety, alas! still languish in the beginning of that holy career; while we, after so many fig-
nal

nal favours received, after so many truths known, after so many sacraments and other duties of religion attended, alas! we still hold to the world and to ourselves by a thousand ties; we are yet but in the first rudiments of faith and of a Christian life, and still more distant than at first, from that zeal and that fervour which constitute the whole value and the whole security of a faithful piety.

My brethren, the dreadful prophecy of Jesus Christ is every day fulfilled before our eyes. Publicans and sinners, persons of a scandalous conduct according even to the world, and as distant from the kingdom of God as the east is from the west, are converted, repent, surprise the world with the sight of a retired and mortified life, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob; and perhaps we who are looked upon as children of the kingdom; we, whose manners present nothing to the eyes of the world but what is orderly and laudable; we, who are held out as morals of propriety and piety; we, whom the world canonises, and which we glorified with the reputation and the appearances of piety, alas! we shall perhaps be rejected and confounded with unbelievers, for having always laboured at our salvation with negligence, and having preserved a heart still altogether worldly, in the midst even of our pious works.

Thus, my brethren, you whom this discourse regards, do not judge of yourselves from the comparison which you inwardly make with those souls whom

whom the world and the passions hurry away. We may be more righteous than the world, and yet not enough so for Jesus Christ: for the world is so corrupted; the gospel is so little known in it; faith is so weakened; the law and truth so little observed, that what is virtue, with regard to it, may still be a great iniquity in the sight of God.

Rather compare yourselves with those holy penitents who formerly edified the church by the prodigy of their austerities, and whose life, even at this day, appears to us so incredible; with those noble martyrs who gave up their body for the truth, and who, amidst the most cruel torments, were transported with joy in contemplating the holy promises; with those primitive believers who suffered death every day for Jesus Christ, and who, under persecution, loss of property, and of their children, thought themselves still possessed of all, as they had neither lost faith nor the hope of a better life: behold the models by whom you ought to measure your piety, to find it still deficient, and all worldly. Unless you resemble them, in vain do you not resemble the world, you shall perish like it; it is not enough that you do not imitate the crimes of the worldly, you must also have the virtues of the just.

Lastly, Not only the goodness of Jesus Christ wishes, in this miracle, to furnish to his disciples and to the Jewish believers a fresh motive for believing in him, but in it his justice likewise supplies
a fresh a fresh occasion of obstinacy and incredulity to the unbelieving Israelites ; last circumstance of our gospel. They take measures to destroy him ; they wish to put Lazarus himself to death, that so striking a testimony of the power of Jesus Christ may no longer continue among them. They had weeped his death ; scarcely is he recalled to life when he appears worthy only of their fury and vengeance. And behold the sole fruit which the generality of you commonly reap from the miracles of grace : that is to say, from the conversion and the spiritual resurrection of great sinners. Before that the mercy of Jesus Christ had cast looks of grace and salvation upon a criminal soul, and, while delivered up to the dominion of the passions, he was not only dead in sin, but spread every where around the infection and the stench of his disorders and scandals, you seemed touched for its errors and shame ; you deplored the misery of his lot ; you mingled your tears and regrets with the tears and regrets of his friends and relatives ; and the public irregularity of his conduct experienced from you every sorrow and compassion of humanity ; but, scarcely hath the grace of Jesus Christ recalled him to life, scarcely, come forth from the tomb and that abyss of corruption in which he was buried, does he render glory to his deliverer by the holy ardours of a tender and sincere piety, than you become the censurers even of his piety : you had appeared touched for the excess of his

vices,

vices, and you publicly deride the excess of his pretended piety. You had blamed his warm pursuits after pleasure, and you condemn the fervor of his love for God. Be consistent, therefore, with yourselves, and decide in favour either of the just or of the sinner.

Yes, my brethren, if the happiness of a soul, who, before your eyes, returns from his errors, excite not your envy; if the contrition of a sinner, who was formerly the companion perhaps of your pleasures and excesses, leave you all your indifference with regard to salvation. Ah! insult not at least his good fortune; despise not in him the gift of God; take not, even from the miracles of grace so proper to open your eyes, a fresh motive of blindness and unbelief; and do not thus change the blessings of God to your brethren, into a dreadful judgment of justice against you.

In reading the history of our gospel, you are sometimes astonished that the obstinacy and blindness of the Jews should be able to resist the most striking miracles of Jesus Christ; you do not comprehend how the raising up of the dead, the curing of persons born blind, and so many other wonders wrought before their eyes, did not force them to acknowledge the truth of his ministry, and the sanctity of his doctrine: you say, that much less would convince you; that any one of all these miracles would suffice, and that you would immediately yield to the truth.

But,

But, my brethren, you condemn yourselves out of your own mouth ; for, (without refuting here that absurd manner of speaking, by those grand and sublime proofs which religion furnishes against impiety, and which we have elsewhere employed), candidly, is it not a more arduous and a more astonishing miracle, that a soul, delivered up to sin, and to the most shameful passions, born with every propensity to voluptuousness, pride, revenge, and ambition, and more distant than any one, by the nature of his heart, from the kingdom of God, and from all the maxims of Christian piety ; that, all at once, that soul should renounce all his gratifications, break asunder all his warmest attachments, repress his liveliest passions, change his most rooted inclinations, forget injuries, attention to the body and to fortune ; no longer have a relish but for prayer, retirement, the practice of the most gloomy and disgusting duties, and hold out to the eyes of the public, in a change, in a resurrection so palpable, the spectacle of a life so different from the former, that the world, that free-thinking itself shall be forced to render glory to the truth of his change, and that they shall no longer know him to be the same ; is it not, I say, a more arduous and more astonishing miracle ?

Now, doth not the mercy of Jesus Christ operate such miracles almost every day before your eyes ? Doth not his holy word, though in a weak and languishing mouth, still raise up, every day, new Lazaruses from the dead? You behold them; you know and you appear astonished at them; yet, nevertheless, do they touch you? Do these wonders which, with so much majesty, the finger of God maketh to shine forth, recall you to truth and to the light? Do these changes, a thousand times more miraculous than the raising up of the dead, convince you? Do they bring you nearer to Jesus Christ, or restore to you that faith which you have lost?

Alas! your whole care, like the Jews, is to stand out against, or to weaken their truth. You deny that grace hath any part in the glory of these wonders; you seek to trace their motives in causes altogether worldly; you consider them as delusions and impositions; you attribute to the artifices of man the most shining operations of the holy Spirit; you insist that such a new life is only a fresh snare to entrap the public credulity, and a new path more securely to attain some worldly purpose. Thus, the works of the almighty power of Jesus Christ harden you; thus, even the wonders of his grace complete your blindness; thus, you make every thing conducive towards your destruction: Jesus Christ becomes to you a stumbling-block, when he ought to have been a source of life and salvation. The examples of sinners stain and corrupt you: their penitence revolts and hardens you.

Great God! suffer then, in order that a life altogether criminal at last be terminated, that I now raise

raise my voice to thee out of the depths in which I have, for so many years, languished : the impure chains with which I am bound, attach me, by so many folds, to the bottom of the gulf in which I drag on my gloomy days, that, in spite of all my good desires, I still remain fettered, and almost incapable of any effort towards disengaging myself and returning to thee, O my God, whom I have forsaken. But, Lord, out of the depths even in which thou seest me, like another Lazarus, fettered and buried, I have, at least, the voice of the heart free to send up, even to the foot of the throne, my sorrows, my lamentations, and my tears.

The voice of a repentant sinner is always agreeable, O Lord, to thine ear ; it is that voice of Jacob which awakens all thy tenderness, even when it offers to thy sight but hands of Esau, and still covered with blood and crimes.

Ah ! thine holy ears, O Lord, have now sufficiently been turned away from my licentious and blasphemous words ; let them now be attentive to the voice of my supplications ; and, let the singularity of the words which I now address to thee, O my God ! attract a more favourable attention to my prayer.

I come not here, great God ! to excuse my disorders in thy sight, by alleging to thee the occasions which have seduced me, the examples which have led me astray, the misfortune of my engagements, ments, and the nature of my heart and of my weakness: cover thine eyes, O Lord, upon the horrors of my past life; the only possibility of excusing them is, not to behold or to know them: alas! if I am unable myself to support even their view; if my crimes dread and fly from mine own eyes, and if my terrors and my weakness render it absolutely necessary to turn my sight from them, how, O Lord, should they be able to sustain the sanctity of thy looks, if thou search into them with that eye of severity which finds stains in the purest and most laudable life?

But thou, O Lord, are not a God like unto man, to whom it is always so difficult to pardon and to forget the injuries of an enemy; goodness and mercy dwell in thine eternal bosom; clemency is the first attribute of thy supreme Being; and thou hast no enemies but those who refuse to place their trust in the abundant riches of thy mercy.

Yes, Lord! be the hour what it may when a criminal soul casts himself upon thy mercy; whether in the morning of life or in the decline of age; whether after the errors of youthful manners or after an entire life of dissipation and licentiousness, thou wouldst, O my God! that their hope in thee be not extinguished; and thou assurest us that the highest point of our crimes is but the lowest degree of thy mercy.

But, likewise, great God! if thou listen to my desires; if, once more, thou restore to me that life and that light which I have lost; if thou break a-funder my chains of death which still fetter me; if thou stretch out thine hand to withdraw me from the gulph in which I am plunged, ah! never, O Lord, shall I cease to proclaim thine eternal mercies: I will forget the whole world, that I may be occupied only with the wonders of thy grace towards my soul: I will every moment of my life render glory to the God who shall have delivered me: my mouth, for ever shut against vain things, shall with difficulty be able to express all the transports of my love and of my gratitude; and thy creature, who still groans under the dominion of the world and of sin, then restored to his true Lord, shall, henceforth and for ever more, bless his deliverer.
and

SER-

SERMON IX.

ON THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

LUKE xxi. 27.

Then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud, with power and great glory.

SUCH will be that last spectacle which shall terminate the eternal revolutions which the aspect of this world is continually offering to our eyes, and which either amuse us through their novelty, or seduce us by their charms. Such will be the coming of the Son of Man, the day of his revelation, the accomplishment of his kingdom, and the complete redemption of his mystical body. Such the day of the manifestation of consciences, that day of misery and despair to one portion of men, and of peace, consolation, and ineffable delight to the other : the sweet expectation of the just, the dread of the wicked ; the day which is to determine the destiny of all men.
of

It was the image, ever present to their minds, of that terrible day which rendered the first believers patient under persecution, delighted under sufferance, and illustrious under injury and reproach. It is that which hath since supported the faith of martyrs, animated the constancy of virgins, and smoothed to the anchorite all the horrors of a desert ; it is that which still, at this day, peoples those religious solitudes erected, by the piety of our ancestors, as asylums against the contagion of the age.

Even you, my brethren, when the awful solemnity of that grand event hath sometimes intruded on your thoughts, have been unable to check feelings of compunction and dread. But these have been only transitory fears ; more smiling and more agreeable ideas have speedily effaced them, and recalled to you your former calm. Alas ! in the happy days of the church it would have been considered as renouncing faith not to have longed for the day of the Lord. The only consolation of those first disciples of faith was in looking forward to it, and the apostles were obliged even to moderate, on that point, the holy eagerness of believers ; and, at present, the church finds itself under the necessity of employing the whole terror of our ministry, in order to recall its remembrance to Christians, and the whole fruit of our discourses is confined to making it dreaded.

I mean

I mean not, however, to display to you here the whole history of that awful event. I wish to confine myself to one of its circumstances, which has always appeared to me as the most proper to make an impression on the heart: it is the manifestation of consciences.

Now, behold my whole design. On this earth the sinner never knows himself such as he is, and is only half-known to men; he lives, in general, unknown to himself, through his blindness, and to others, through his dissimulation and cunning. In that grand day he will know himself, and will be known. The sinner laid open to himself: the sinner laid open to all creatures: behold the subject upon which I have resolved to make some simple and, I trust, edifying reflections.

PART I. "All things are reserved for a future day, says the sage Ecclesiastes, and no man knoweth them here below, for all things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not; as is the good, so is the sinner."

What idea, indeed, should we have of Providence in the government of the universe, were we to judge of its wisdom and justice only from the diverse lots which it provides on this earth for men? What! The good and the evil should be dispensed on the earth, without choice, respect, or discrimination?

nation? The just man should almost always groan under affliction and want, whilst the wicked should live surrounded with glory, pleasures, and affluence, and, after fortunes so different, and manners so dissimilar, both should alike sink into an eternal oblivion; and that just and avenging God, whom they should afterwards meet, would not deign either to weigh their deeds or to distinguish their merits? Thou, O Lord, art just, and wilt render to each according to his works.

This grand point of Christian faith, so consistent even with natural equity, supposed: I say, that, in that terrible day, when, in the face of the universe, the sinner shall appear before that awful tribunal accompanied by his works, the manifestation of consciences will be the most horrible punishment of the unfaithful soul. A rigorous examination shall, in the first place, make him known to himself: and behold all the circumstances of that awful discussion.

I ought, in the first place, to make you observe all the titles with which he will be invested who shall examine you, and which announce all the rigour with which he shall weigh in the balance your deeds and thoughts. It will be a rigid legislator, jealous of the sanctity of his law, and who will judge you only by it; all the softenings, all the vain interpretations, which custom or a false knowledge had invented, shall vanish; the lustre of the law will dissipate them; the resources with which they had flattered the sinner, will sink into nothing ; and the incensed legislator will examine almost more rigorously the false interpretations which had changed its purity, than the manifest transgressions which had violated it. It will be a judge charged with the interests of his Father's glory against the sinner, established to decide betwixt God and man ; and that day will be the day of his zeal for the honour of the divinity, against those who shall not have rendered to him that honour which is his due : a Saviour, who will shew you his wounds to reproach your ingratitude ; all that he hath done for you will rise up against you ; his blood, the price of your salvation, will loudly demand your destruction ; and his despised kindneses will be numbered among your heaviest crimes : the searcher of hearts, to whose eyes the most hidden councils and the most secret thoughts will all be laid open : lastly, a God of terrible majesty, before whom the heavens shall dissolve, the elements shall be confounded, and all nature overturned ; and whose scrutiny, with all the terror of his presence, the sinner shall singly be forced to support.

Now, behold the circumstances of that awful examination. 1stly, It will be the same for all men : and, as St Matthew says, before him shall be gathered all nations. The difference of ages, countries, conditions, birth, and temperament, shall no longer be there attended to ; and as the gospel, on which you will be judged, is the law of all times and conditions, and holds out the same rules to the prince and to the subject, to the great and to the lowly, to the anchorite and to the man immersed in the affairs of the world; to the believer who lived in the fervor of the primitive times, and to him who hath the misfortune to live in the relaxation of the present age; no distinction will be made in the manner of proceeding on the examination of the guilty. Vain excuses on rank and birth, on the dangers of his station, on the manners of his age, on the weakness of temperament, will then be no longer listened to from you; and, with respect to modesty, chastity, ambition, forgiveness of injuries, renouncement of one's self, mortification of the senses, the just Judge will demand an exact account, equally from the Greek as from the Barbarian; from the poor as from the powerful: from the man of the world as from the solitary; from the prince as from the humblest subject; lastly, from the Christians of these latter times as from the first disciples of the gospel.

Vain judgments of the earth, how shall you then be confounded! And how little shall we then estimate nobility of blood, the glory of ancestry, the blaze of reputation, the distinction of talents, and all those pompous titles with which men endeavour on this earth to puff out their meanness, and to found so many vain distinctions and privileges, leges, when we shall see, amidst that crowd of guilty, the sovereign confounded with the slave; the great with the meanest of the people; the learned promiscuously blended with the ignorant and mean; the gods of war, these invincible and far-famed characters who had filled the universe with their name, at the side of the husbandman and labourer; thou alone, O my God! hast glory, power, and immortality; and, all the titles of vanity being destroyed and annihilated with the world which had invented them, each will appear before thee accompanied solely by his works!

2dly, That examination will be universal, that is to say, that it will comprehend all the different ages and circumstances of your life: the weaknesses of childhood, which have escaped your remembrance; the transports of youth, of which almost every moment has been a crime; the ambition and the anxieties of a riper age; the obstinacy and the chagrins of an old age, still perhaps voluptuous. What astonishment, when repassing over the diverse parts which you have acted on the earth, you shall find yourself every where profane, dissolute, voluptuous, without virtue, without penitence, without good works; having passed through a diversity of situations merely in order to amass a more abundant treasure of wrath; and having lived in these diverse states as if, to a certainty, all were to die with you!

The

The variety of events, which succeed each other here below, and divide our life, fix our attention only on the present, and do not permit us to recollect it in the whole, or fully to see what we really are. We never regard ourselves but in that point of view in which our present situation holds us out; the last situation is always the one which leads us to judge of ourselves; a sentiment of salvation, with which God sometimes indulges us, calms us on an insensibility of many years; a day, passed in exercises of piety, makes us forget a life of crimes; the declaration of our faults, at the tribunal of penitence, effaces them from our remembrance, and they become to us as though they had never been: in a word, of all the different states of our conscience we never see but the present. But, in the presence of the terrible Judge, the whole will be visible at once; the history will be entirely laid open. From the very first feeling formed by your heart, even to its last sigh, all shall be collected before your eyes; all the iniquities, dispersed through the different stages of your life, will then confront you; not an action, not a desire, not a word, not a thought, will there be omitted; for, if our hairs be numbered, judge of our deeds. We shall see spring up the whole course of our years, which, though as if annihilated to us, yet lived in the eyes of God; and there we shall find, not those perishable histories in which our vain actions were to be transmitted to posterity;

ly;

ty ; not those flattering recitals of our military exploits, of those brilliant events which had filled so many volumes, and exhausted so much praise ; not those public records in which are set down the nobility of our birth, the antiquity of our origin, the fame of our ancestors, the dignities which have rendered them illustrious, the lustre which we have added to their name, and all the history, as I may say, of human illusion and weakness ; that immortality so vaunted, which it promised to us, shall be buried in the ruins and in the wrecks of the universe ; but there we shall see the most shocking and exact history of our heart, of our mind, of our imagination ; that is to say, that internal and invisible part of our life, equally unknown to ourselves as to the rest of men.

Yes, my brethren : besides the exterior history of our manners, which will be all recalled, what will most astonish us is, the secret history of our heart, which will then be wholly laid open to our eyes ; of that heart which we have never founded, never known ; of that heart which continually eluded our search, and, under specious names, disguised from us the shame of its passions ; of that heart whose elevation, probity, magnanimity, disinterestedness, and natural goodness we have so much vaunted ; which the public error and adulation had beheld as such, and which had occasioned our being exalted above other men. So many shameful desires, which were scarcely formed before

before we endeavoured to conceal them from ourselves; so many absurd projects of fortune and elevation, sweet delusions, up to which our seduced heart continually gave itself; so many secret and mean jealousies which were the invisible principle of all our conduct, yet, nevertheless, which we dissembled through pride; so many criminal dispositions which had, a thousand times, induced us ardently to wish, that either the pleasures of the senses were eternal, or that, at least, they should remain unpunished; so many hatreds and animosities which, unknown to ourselves, had corrupted our heart; so many defiled and vicious intentions, with regard to which we were so ingenious in flattering ourselves; so many projects of iniquity to which opportunity had alone been wanting, and which we reckoned as nothing, because they had never departed from the heart: in a word, that vicissitude of passions which, in succession, had possession of our heart: behold what shall all be displayed before our eyes. We shall see, says a holy father, come out, as from an ambuscade, numberless crimes of which we could never believe ourselves capable. We shall be shewn to ourselves; we shall be made to enter into our own heart, where we had never resided: a sudden light shall clear up that abyss: that mystery of iniquity shall be revealed: and we shall see that which of all we knew least, that was ourselves.

To the examination of the evils we have committed will succeed that of the good which we have failed to do. The endless omissions of which our life has been full, and for which we had never felt even remorse, will be recalled; so many circumstances where our character engaged us to render glory to truth, and where we have betrayed it through vile motives of interest, or mean compliances; so many opportunities of doing good, provided for us by the goodness of God, and which we have almost always neglected; so much culpable and voluntary ignorance, in consequence of having always dreaded the light, and even fled from those who could have instructed us; so many events so calculated to open our eyes, and which have served only to increase our blindness; so much good which, through our talents or our example, we might have done, and which we have prevented by our vices; so many souls whose innocence might have been preserved by our bounty, and whom we have left to perish by refusing to abate from our profusions; so many crimes which might have been prevented in our inferiors or equals by prudent remonstrances and useful advice, and which indolence, meanness, and perhaps more culpable views, have made us suppress; so many days and moments which might have been placed to advantage for Heaven, and which we have spent in inutility and an unworthy effeminacy. And what in this is more dreadful, is that, in our own eyes, that was the most innocent part of our life, offering nothing to our remembrance, as we think, but a great void.
that

What endless regret, then, to the unfaithful soul to see such a list of days sacrificed to inutility, to that world which is no more ; while a single moment, consecrated to a God faithful to his promises, might have merited the felicity of the holy ! To see so many meannesses, so many subjections for the sake of riches, and a miserable fortune which could last only for a moment ; while a single violence, suffered for the sake of Jesus Christ, would have secured to him an immortal crown ! What regret, when he now finds that not half the cares and anxieties were required for his salvation which he has undergone to accomplish his destruction ; and that a single day of that long life, wholly devoted to the world, had sufficed for eternity !

To that examination will succeed, in the fourth place, that of mercies which you have abused ; so many holy inspirations either rejected or only half prosecuted ; so many watchful attentions of Providence to your soul rendered unavailing ; so many truths, declared through our ministry, which, in many believers, have operated penitence and salvation, but have always been sterile in your heart ; so many afflictions and disappointments, which the Lord had provided for you, in order to recall you to him, and of which you have always made so unworthy an use ; even so many natural gifts which once were blossoms of virtue, and which you have turned into agents of vice; ah! if the unprofitable servant be cast into utter darkness for having only hidden his talent, with what indulgence can you flatter yourself, you who have received so many, and who have always employed them against the glory of that Master who had entrusted them to you?

Here, indeed, it is that the reckoning will be terrible. Jesus Christ will demand from you the price of his blood. You sometimes complain that God doth not enough for you; that he hath brought you into the world weak, and of a temperament of which you are not the master; and that he bestoweth not the necessary grace to enable you to resist the many opportunities which drag you away. Ah! you will then see that your whole life has been a continued abuse of his mercies; you will see that, among so many infidel nations which know him not, you have been privileged, enlightened, called to faith, nourished in the doctrine of truth and the virtue of the sacrament, incessantly supported by his inspirations and his grace; you will be shocked to see all that God hath done for you, and the little that you have done for him; and your complaints will quickly be changed into an utter confusion, destitute of every resource but in the horrors of your own despair.

Hitherto the just Judge hath examined you only on those crimes which are especially your own; but

but what will it be when he shall enter into a reckoning with you on the sins of others, of which you have been either the occasion or the cause, and which will, consequently, be charged to your account? What a new sink! All the souls to whom you have been a subject of scandal and ruin will be presented to you; all the souls whom your discourses, your counsels, your example, your sollicitations, your immodesties, have precipitated, with yourself, into eternal destruction; all the souls whose weakness you have either seduced, or whose innocence you have corrupted, whose faith you have perverted, whose virtue you have shaken, whose free-thinking you have authorised, or whose impiety you have strengthened by your persuasions, or by the example of your life. Jesus Christ, to whom they belonged, and who had purchased them with his blood, will demand them at your hands, as a dear heritage, as a precious conquest, which you have unjustly ravished from him; and, if the Lord marked Cain with the sign of reprobation in demanding account from him of the blood of his brother, judge with what sign you shall be marked when you shall be brought to a reckoning for his soul.

But this is not all. Were you a public character, and high in authority, what abuses authorised! What iniquities glanced over! What duties sacrificed, either to your own interests, or to the passions and interests of others! What respect of persons, in opposition to equity and conscience! What iniquitous

iniquitous undertakings counselled! What wars, perhaps, what confusions, what public evils, of which you have either been the author or the infamous agent! You will see that your ambition or your counsels have been as the fatal source of an infinity of miseries, of the calamities of your age, of those evils which are perpetuated, and pass from father to son; and you will be surpris'd to find that your iniquities have surviv'd yourself, and that, even long after death, you were still culpable, before God, of an infinity of crimes and disorders which took place on the earth. And now it is, my brethren, that the danger of public stations shall be known, the precipices which surround the throne itself, the rocks of authority, and with what reason the gospel denominated happy those who live in the obscurity of a private station; with what it was that religion wish'd to inspire us with so much horror at ambition, so much indifference towards the grandeurs of the earth, so much contempt for all that is exalted only in the eyes of men, and so frequently recommended to us to love only what we ought for ever to love.

But, exempted perhaps from all these vices which we have just been mentioning, and attached, for a long time past, to the duties of a Christian life, you presume, that this terrible examination will either not regard you, or, at any rate, that you will appear there with more confidence than the criminal soul. Undoubtedly, my dear hearer, hearer, that will be the day of triumph and glory for the just ; the day which will justify these pretended excesses of retreat, mortification, modesty, and delicacy of conscience, which had furnished to the world so many subjects of censure and profane derision : the just shall, no doubt, appear before that awful tribunal with more confidence than the sinner ; but he will also appear there, and even his righteousness shall be judged : your virtues, your holy works, will be submitted to that rigorous examination. The world, which often refuses the praises due to the truest virtue, too often likewise grants them to the sole appearances of virtue : there are even so many just who deceive themselves, and who are indebted, for that name and that reputation, merely to the public error. Thus, it is not only Tyre and Sidon that I shall visit in the day of my wrath, sayeth the Lord ; that is to say, those sinners whom their crimes seemed to confound with the unbelievers and the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon : I shall carry the light of my judgments even to Jerusalem ; that is to say, I will examine, I will search into, I will fathom the motives of those holy works which seem to equal you with the most faithful of the holy Jerusalem.

I will trace, even to the source, the motive of that conversion which made so much noise in the world ; and it shall be seen whether I find not its origin in some secret disgust, in the declension of youth and fortune, in private views of favour and preferment, preferment, rather than in the detestation of sin and love of righteousness.

I will balance those liberalities poured out on the bosom of the poor, those compassionate visits, that zeal for pious undertakings, that protection granted to my servants with complaisance, a desire of esteem, ostentation, and worldly views which have infected them; and, in my sight, they shall perhaps appear to be rather the fruits of pride, than the consequences of grace and the work of my Spirit.

I will recall that train of prayer and other holy practices of which you had made a kind of habit, which no longer roused within you any feeling of faith and compunction; and you shall know whether lukewarmness, negligence, the little fruit which attended them, and the little disposition within you previous to them, have not, before me, constituted so many infidelities for which you shall be judged without mercy.

I will search into that removal from the world and from pleasures, that singularity of conduct, that affectation of modesty and regularity; and, perhaps, I shall find them more the consequence of humour, temperament, and indolence, than of faith; and that, in a life more regular and more retired, in the opinion of men, you shall still have preserved all your self-love, your attachment to the flesh, all the niceties of sensuality; and, in a word, all the sins of the most worldly souls.

I will

I will search, even to the bottom, that pretended zeal for my glory which made you so deeply lament over the scandals of which you were a spectator, which led you to condemn them with such confidence and pride, and to blaze out, with such warmth, against the irregularities and weaknesses of your brethren; and, perhaps, shall that zeal be no longer in my sight but a natural severity of temper, a malignity of disposition, an inclination towards censure and upbraiding, an indiscreet warmth, a vain ostentatious zeal; far from finding you full of zeal for my glory, and for the salvation of your brethren, you shall no longer appear before me, but unjust, obstinate, malicious, and rash.

I will demand an account from you of those splendid talents which, it would appear, you employed only for my glory and for the instruction of believers; and which had drawn upon you the blessings of the just, and the acclamations even of the worldly; and, perhaps, that continual attention to, and gratification of your own pride, the desire of surpassing others, and your sensibility of human applause, will prove the prominent features of your works to be only the works of man and the fruits of pride; and that I shall curse those labours which had sprung from so impure a source.

Great God! What works, upon which I had so firmly depended, shall then be found dead in thine eyes! How terrible shall be that discrimination!

And

And, of all the actions which we have performed even for heaven, how few wilt thou acknowledge as thine, and which thou wilt deem worthy of reward!

Do not from thence conclude, my brethren, that it is then needless to labour for salvation, seeing the just Judge shall seek only the condemnation of men: only their condemnation. My brethren? He is come solely to save them, and his mercies will far surpass even his justice. But behold the conclusion which you ought rather to draw. Those righteous souls whom you so frequently accuse of excess, of scrupulosity in the practice of the duties of a Christian life, as though they carried things too far; these souls, exposed to the light of God, shall appear lukewarm, sensual, imperfect, and perhaps criminal: and you, who live in the dangers and pleasures of the world; you, who devote to religion and your salvation only the most idle moments of your life; you, who scarcely mingle a single work of piety with an entire year of dissipation and inutility, in what situation shall you then be, my dear hearer? If those, who shall have only laudable works to present, shall yet be in danger of rejection, what shall be your destiny? You, who have only a life entirely worldly to offer? If the tree full of blossoms be treated with such rigour, what shall become of the withered and barren tree? And, if the just be even with difficulty saved; I speak not of the sinner, for
he

he is already judged ; but the worldly soul, who lives without either vice or virtue, how shall he dare to appear ?

You after say, my dear hearer, that your conscience does not reproach you with great crimes : that, it not good, neither are you bad, and that your only sin is indolence and sloth. Ah ! you shall then know yourself before the tribunal of Jesus Christ. You shall see whether the testimony of your conscience, which reproached you not with crimes, and left you scarcely any thing culpable to confess, were not a terrible blindness, up to which the justice of God had always delivered you. From the dread in which you shall see the just, you shall find what ought to be your own fears ; and whether the confidence in which you have always lived, sprung from the peace of a good conscience, or from the false security of a worldly one.

O my God ! cries St Augustin, could I but see, at this moment, the state of my soul as thou shalt then lay it open to me ! Could I despoil myself of those prejudices which blind me ; mistrust those examples which confirm me ; those customs which quiet me ; those talents which dazzle me ; those praises which seduce me ; that rank and those titles which deceive me ; and those complaisances of a sacred guide, which form all my security ; could I but despoil myself of that self-love which is the source of all my errors, and behold myself alone at thy feet, in thy light : O my God ! what horror would I not feel for myself? And what measures would I not take, in humbling myself before thee, to prevent the public shame of that awful day, when the councils of hearts, and the secrecy of thoughts, shall be manifested? For, my brethren, not only shall the sinner be shewn to himself, but he shall likewise be shewn to all creatures.

PART II. That mixture of good and wicked, inevitable on this earth, gives birth to two disorders. In the first place, through favour of that mixture, concealed vice escapes that public ignominy which is its due; virtue, not known, receives not the applause it merits. In the second place, the sinner, high in honours, frequently fills the most distinguished offices, while the good and pious man lives in humiliation, and crawls like a slave at his feet. Now, on that terrible day, a double manifestation shall be made, which will repair that two-fold disorder. In the first place, the sinful will be marked out from the just by the public exposition of their conscience. In the second place, they will be discerned by separation from them, and the difference of their stations before the throne of glory.

In order fully to comprehend all the shame and confusion with which the criminal soul shall then be covered, when shewn to all creatures, and all his vices, the most secret, exposed to the light, it requires only to pay attention: viz, To the number and character of the spectators who shall witness ness his shame: 2dly, To the care he had taken to conceal his weakneses and debaucheries from the eyes of men, while on the earth: 3dly, and lastly, To his personal qualities, which will render his confusion still more deep and overwhelming.

Here figure to yourselves, then, my brethren, the criminal soul before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, surrounded by angels and men; the just, the sinful, his relations, his subjects, his masters, his friends, his enemies, all their eyes fixed on him; present at the terrible scrutiny which the just Judge will make into his actions, his desires, and his thoughts; forced, in spite of themselves, to assist at his judgment, and to witness the justice of the sentence which the Son of Man shall pronounce against him. All the resources which, on this earth, might soften the most humiliating confusion, shall fail, on that day, to the unfaithful soul.

First resource. On this earth, when guilty of a fault which has sunk us into contempt, the whole has turned on a certain number of witnesses confined to our nation, or to the place of our birth; we may have removed ourselves from them, in the course of time, to avoid continually reading, in their eyes, the remembrance and reproach of our past shame; we may have changed our place of dwelling to go elsewhere among strangers, to recover a reputation which we had already lost. But, on that grand day, all men assembled shall be acquainted with the secret history of your manners and of your conscience : you shall no longer have it in your power to go, to hide yourself far from the looks of the spectators, to seek new countries, and, like Cain, to fly into the desert. Each shall be fixed immovable in the place marked out for him, bearing on his forehead the sentence of his condemnation and the history of his whole life, obliged to sustain the eyes of the universe, and the whole shame of his weaknesses. There shall no longer, then, be any hidden spot wherein to conceal himself from the public regard ; the light of God, the sole glory of the Son of Man, will fill the heavens and the earth ; and, in all that immensity of space around you, you will, in every part, discover from afar only watchful eyes fixed on you.
and

Second resource. On the earth, when our shame is even public, and, when degraded in the minds of men, in consequence of some striking fault, yet there are always some friends grounded in our favour, whose esteem and society recompense us, in some measure, for the public contempt, and whose kindness assists us in sustaining the inveteracy of the general censure. But, on this occasion, the presence of our friends will be the object by far the most insupportable to our shame. If sinners, like ourselves, they will cast up to us our common pleasures and our example, which, perhaps, have been the first rock upon which their innocence split : if just, as they had believed us to be children of light, ah ! they will reproach to us their good

good opinion abused, and their friendship seduced. You loved the just, shall they fav to us, and you hated righteoufness; you protected virtue, yet, in your heart, you placed vice on the throne: in us you fought that probity, that fidelity, and that security which you found not in your worldly friends, but you fought not the Lord who formed all these virtues in our heart: ah! did not the author of all our gifts deserve to be more loved, more fought after than we!

And behold the third resource, which shall fail, to the confusion of the criminal soul. For, should no friends be found on this earth to interest themselves in our misfortunes, there are always, at least, indifferent persons whom our faults do not wound or excite against us. But, on that terrible day, we shall have no indifferent spectators. The just, so feeling on this earth to the calamities of their brethren, so ingenious in excusing their faults, and so ready in covering them with the veil of charity, in order, at least, to soften, if they cannot find an apparent excuse for them in the eyes of men; the just, then, despoiled, like the Son of Man, of that indulgence and pity which they had exercised towards their brethren on the earth, shall hiss at the sinner, says the prophet, shall insult him, and shall demand his punishment from the Lord to avenge his glory; they shall enter into the zeal and the interests of his justice; and, becoming judges themselves, they shall mock him, says the prophet, and say, say, "Lo, this is the man that made not God his " strength ; but trusted in the abundance of his

 " riches, and strengthened himself in his wicked-" nefs. Behold, now, that foolish man, who be" lieved himself the only sage on the earth, and
 " who considered the life of the just as a folly ;
 " who made to himself, in the favour of the great,
 " in the vanity of titles and dignities, in the ex" tent of his lands and possessions, in the good o" pinion and applauses of men, supports of dirt,
 " which were to perish with him. Where, now,
 " are your gods, your rock in whom you trusted ?
 " Let them rise up and help you, and be your " protection."

Nor shall sinners be more indulgent to his misery ; they will feel for him all that horror which they shall be forced to feel for themselves ; the fellowship of misfortune, which ought to unite, will be only an eternal hatred which shall divide them ;
 only a cruel inveteracy, which shall fill their hearts with nothing but sentiments of cruelty and fury against their brethren ; and they will hate, in others, the same crimes from which all their miseries spring. In a word, the men most distant from us, the most savage nations, to whom the name of Jesus Christ hath never been announced, come then, but too late, to the knowledge of truth, shall rise up against you, and reproach to you, that, if the miracles which God had, in vain, operated amongst you had been wrought before their eyes ; that if they,

they, like you, had been enlightened by the gospel, and sustained by the succours of faith, they would have done penance in sackcloth and ashes, and put to advantage, for their salvation, those favours which you have abused for your destruction.

Such shall be the confusion of the reprobate soul. Accursed before God, he will find himself, at the same time, the outcast of heaven and of earth, the shame and curse of all creatures: even the inanimate, which he had forced to be subservient to his passions, and which groaned, says St Paul, in the expectation of deliverance from that shameful servitude, shall, in their way, rise up against him. The sun, of which he had abused the light, shall be darkened, as if it were not to shine on his crimes: the stars shall disappear, as if to tell him that they have too long witnessed his iniquitous passions: the earth shall crumble from under his feet, as if to eject, from its bosom, a monster which it could no longer bear: and the whole universe, says Solomon, shall arm against him to avenge the glory of the Lord whom he has insulted. Alas! we so dearly love to be lamented in our misfortunes: indifference alone irritates and wounds us: here, not only shall all hearts be shut to our misfortunes, but all beholders shall insult our shame, and the only portion left to the sinner shall be his confusion, his despair, and his crimes. First circumstance of the confusion of the criminal soul: viz, the multitude of witnesses.

I take

I take the second from the care and anxiety they had taken, whilst living on the earth, to disguise and conceal themselves from the eyes of men. For, my brethren, the world is a grand theatre on which almost every one acts a borrowed character. As we are full of passions, and as all passions have always in them something mean and despicable, our whole attention is employed in concealing their meanness, and in endeavouring to give ourselves out for what we are not : iniquity is always treacherous and deceitful. Thus, your whole life, you, above all, who listen to me, and who considered the duplicity of your character as knowledge of the world and of the court ; your whole life has been only one train of dissimulation and artifice ; even your sincerest and most intimate friends have only, in part, known you ; you were beyond the reach of the world, for you changed character, sentiment, and inclination, according to circumstances and the disposition of those to whom you wished to make yourselves agreeable ; through these means you had acquired the reputation of ability and wisdom ; but there shall be seen, in its native colours, a mean and treacherous soul destitute of probity and truth, and whose principal virtue had been the concealment of its baseness and meanness.

You, likewise, unfaithful soul, whom a sex more jealous of honour had rendered still more attentive to conceal your weaknesses from the eyes of men, you were so artful in saving yourself from a discovery ; you took from so far, and so surely, your measures to deceive the eyes of a husband, the vigilance of a mother, and, perhaps, the probity of a confessor : you would not have survived the accident which had therein betrayed your precautions and artifices. Vain cares ! you only covered your lewdnesses, says the prophet, with a spider's web, which, on that great day, the Son of Man shall dissipate with a single blast of his mouth. In the presence of all assembled nations, sayeth the Lord, I will gather around thee all thy lovers. They shall see that eternal train of artifices, disguises, and meannesses ; that shameful traffic of protestations and oaths which you made instrumental to so many different passions, and, at the same time, to lull their credulity ; they shall see them, and, tracing even to the source those criminal favours which you had bestowed on them, they shall find them not in their pretended merit as you had wished to make them believe, but in your own infamous character, in a heart naturally lewd ; you, who pique yourselves on having a heart so noble, so sincere, and so incapable of being touched but by merit alone. And all this shall take place before the eyes of the universe ; of those friends whom an appearance of regularity had preserved to you ; of your relations who were ignorant of the disgrace with which you covered them ; of that husband who had so much depended on your affection and fidelity.
you

O my God ! is there an abyss sufficiently profound in the earth in which the unfaithful soul would not then wish to hide himself ? For, in the world, men never see but the outside and the scandal of our vices ; and, besides, our confusion is shared and countenanced by those who are continually culpable of the same faults. But, before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, your weaknesses shall be seen even in your heart ; that is to say, their birth, their progress, their most private motives, and a thousand shameful and personal circumstances, which, even more than the crimes themselves, shall cover you with shame : it will be a confusion in which none shall bear a share, and, consequently, will be entirely your own.

Lastly, The final circumstance, which shall render the shame of the sinner overwhelming, is his personal qualities.

You passed in the world for a faithful, sincere, and generous friend : it will be seen that you were vile, perfidious, interested, without faith, honour, probity, conscience, or character. You gave yourself out for a towering mind above all the vulgar prejudices ; and you shall unfold the most humiliating meannesses and circumstances, at which the vilest soul would almost expire with shame. In the world you were regarded as a man of integrity, and of an approved probity in the administration of your charge; that reputation had perhaps attracted fresh honours, and acquired to you the public confidence; you, nevertheless, abused the credulity of men; those pompous shews of equity concealed an unjust and servile soul, and a thousand times had your fidelity been in secret betrayed, and your conscience corrupted by views of fortune and motives of interest; you were apparently adorned with sanctity and righteousness; you had always assumed the semblance of the just; you were believed to be the friend of God, and the faithful observer of his law; yet your heart was not upright before the Lord; under the cloak of religion you covered a defiled conscience and ignominious concealments; you walked in the way of holy things more securely to attain your purposes. Ah! on that day of revelation you go to undeceive the whole universe; those who had seen you on the earth, astonished at your unexpected lot, shall search among the reprobate to discover the upright man; the hope of the hypocrite shall then be overthrown: you unjustly had enjoyed the esteem of men; you shall be known and God avenged. Lastly, Yet shall I dare to say it; and here reveal the shame of my brethren? You were perhaps the dispenser of holy things, high in honour in the temple of God; the charge of faith, of doctrine, and of piety, was intrusted to you; you appeared every day in the sanctuary, clothed in the formidable tokens of your dignity, offering up pure gifts and sacrifices without stain; you were intrusted with the secrecies of consciences; you sustained the weak in faith; you spoke of wisdom among the instructed; and, under all that religion hath most august or most holy, you perhaps concealed whatever the earth has most execrable. You were an impostor, a man of sin seated in the temple of God; you instructed others, and you taught not yourself; you inspired horror against idols, and your days were only numbered by your sacrileges. Ah! the mystery of iniquity shall then be revealed; and you shall at last be known for what you have always been, the curse of heaven and the shame of the earth.
of

up

Behold, my brethren, all the confusion with which the criminal soul shall be overwhelmed. And it will not be a transitory confusion. In the world we have only the first shame of a fault to undergo: the noise of it gradually dies away; new adventures at last take place of ours; and the remembrance of our disgrace fades away, and disappears with the rumour which had published them. But, at the great day, shame shall eternally remain upon the criminal soul; there shall no longer be any fresh events to obliterate his crimes and his confusion; nothing shall more change: all shall be fixed and eternal: that which he shall have appeared before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, that will he for ever appear: even the nature of his torments shall incessantly publish the nature of his crimes; crimes; and his shame shall every day be renewed in his punishment. My brethren, reflections here are needless; and, if some remains of faith still exist within you, it is for you to sound your own consciences, and, from this moment, to adopt such measures as may enable you to sustain the manifestation of that great day.

But, after having shewn to you the public confusion with which the sinner shall be covered; why may not I expose to you here what shall be the glory and the consolation of the truly just man, when the secrecies of his conscience shall be laid open to the universe; when the whole mystery of his heart shall be unfolded; of that heart, of which all the loveliness, concealed from the eyes of men was known only to God; of that heart in which he had always supposed stains and defilements; and of which his humility had concealed from himself all the holiness and innocence; of that heart in which God alone had always dwelled, and which he had taken pleasure in adorning and enriching with his gifts and grace! What new wonders shall that divine sanctuary, hitherto so impenetrable, then offer to the eyes of the beholders, when the veil shall be removed from it! What fervent desires! What secret victories! What heroic sacrifices! What pure prayers! What tender lamentations! What faith! What grandeur! What elevation above all those vain objects which form all the desires and hopes of men! Then it shall indeed deed be seen, that nothing was so great, or so worthy of admiration in the world, as a truly just man; as those souls who were considered as useless, because they were so to our passions; and whose obscure and retired life was so much despised. It shall be seen that the heart of the faithful soul possessed more lustre and grandeur than all those great events which take place on the earth, was alone worthy of being written down in the eternal books, and offered to the eyes of God a sight more worthy of angels and men than all the victories and conquests, which here below, fill the vanity of histories, to which pompous monuments are erected in order to eternise their remembrance, and which, then, shall no longer be considered but as puerile squabbles, or the fruit of pride and the human passions. First disorder repaired on that great day: vice concealed here below from public shame, and virtue from the applause its merits.

The second disorder, which the mixture of the good and of the bad gives birth to in the world, is the inequality of conditions, and the unjust exchange of their lots. It is with the present age as with the image of which Daniel explained the mystery: the just, like the clay which we trample under our feet, or, like iron hardened in the fire of tribulation, in general occupy, here below, only the meanest and most contemptible stations; while, on the contrary, the sinful and the worldly, typified

fied by the gold and silver, vain objects of their passions, almost always find themselves placed at the head of affairs, and in the most eminent places. Now, this is a disorder; and, although the good be thereby exercised, and the wicked hardened; although this confusion of good and evil enter into the order of Providence; and that, by ways and means impenetrable to man, God make use of them to lead the just and the sinner to his purposes, yet it is necessary that the Son of Man gather together all things; and that it shall at last be discerned between the righteous and the wicked; between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not. Now, behold the grand spectacle of that last day: order shall be re-established; the good separated from the wicked: the sheep set on his right hand, and the goats on the left.

Separation, isly, altogether new. It will not be demanded from you, in order to determine what rank you ought to hold in this awful scene, what were your names, your birth, your titles, or your dignities; these were but a vapour, which had no reality but in the public illusion; you will be examined only to prove whether you be an unclean animal or an innocent sheep: the prince shall not be separated from the subject; the noble from the peasant; the poor from the powerful; the conqueror from the vanquished; but the chaff from the good grain; the vessels of honour from the vessels of shame; the goats from the sheep.

The

The Son of Man shall be seen from on high, casting his regards over all the mingled nations and people assembled at his feet; recalling, in that view, the history of the universe, that is to say, of the passions or of the virtues of men; he shall be seen gathering together his chosen from the four quarters; choosing them from among every tongue, every station, and every nation; re-uniting the children of Israel dispersed through the universe; unfolding the secret history of an holy and new people; bringing forth to view heroes of faith till then unknown in the world; no more distinguishing ages by the victories of conquerors, by the establishment or the fall of empires, by the politeness or the barbarity of the times, by the great characters who have blazed in every age, but by the diverse triumphs of grace, by the hidden victories of the just over their passions, by the establishment of his reign in a heart, by the heroical fortitude of a persecuted believer. You shall see him change the face of all things, create a new heaven and a new earth, and reduce that infinite variety of people, titles, conditions, and dignities to a people holy, and a people reprobate, to the goats and the sheep.

Separation, 2dly, cruel. The father shall be separated from his child; friend from friend; brother from brother: the one shall be taken, the other left. Death, which deprives us of the dearest friends, and whose loss occasions to us so many sights

sighs and tears, leaves us, at least, a consolation in the hope of being one day re-united to them. Here, the separation is eternal ; no hope of re-union shall more exist ; we shall no more have relatives, father, child, friend ; no other ties than everlasting flames, which shall for ever unite us to the reprobate.

Separation, 3dly, ignominious. We are so touchy on a preference, when neglected, or left blended with the crowd on any splendid occasion ; we are so peevish and so irritated, when, in the distribution of favours, we see novices carrying off the palm and the principal offices ; our services forgotten, and those, whom we had always seen far below us, now exalted and placed over our heads : but, on that grand day it is that preference shall be accompanied with circumstances the most humiliating and the most galling to the criminal soul. In that universal silence, in that dreadful expectation, in which each one shall be for the decision of his destiny. You shall see the Son of Man advancing in the heavens, with crowns in one hand and the rod of wrath in the other, to carry off, from your side, a just soul whose innocence you, perhaps, had blackened by rash discourses, or whose virtue you had insulted by impious pleasantries ; a believer who was, perhaps, born your subject ; a Lazarus who in vain, perhaps, had importuned you with the recital of his wants and poverty ; a rival whom you had always beheld with an eye of scorn, and upon whose ruins your intrigues and artifices had perhaps exalted you. You shall see the Son of Man place a crown of immortality on his head, seat him at his right hand, while you, like the proud Haman, rejected, humbled, and degraded, shall no longer have before your eyes but the preparation of your punishment.

Yes, my brethren, every galling and overwhelming circumstance shall attend that preference. A savage converted to faith shall be ranked among the sheep, while a Christian inheritor of the promises shall be left among the goats. The layman shall ascend, like the eagle over its prey, while the minister of Jesus Christ shall grovel on the earth, covered with shame and reproach. The man of the world shall pass to the right hand, while the recluse passes to the left. The wise, the learned, the critic of the age, shall be driven to the side of the unclean; and the idiot, who knew not how to answer even the common salutations, shall be placed on a throne of glory and light. Rahab, a sinful woman, shall mount up to the heavenly Sion along with the true Israelites; while the sister of Moses, and the spouse of Jesus Christ, shall be driven from the camp and the tents of Israel, and shall appear covered with a shameful leprosy. Thou art determined, O my God! that nothing shall be wanting towards the despair of the criminal soul. It is not sufficient that he shall be overwhelmed under the weight of his own misery; thou shalt create create for him a new punishment in the felicity of the just, who, preferred to him, shall be seen conducted by angels into the bosom of immortality.

What change of scene, my brethren, in the universe! It is then that, all scandals being plucked out from the kingdom of Jesus Christ, and the just wholly separated from the sinful, they shall form a holy nation, a chosen race, and the church of first-born, whose names were written down in heaven: It is then that the commerce of the wicked, inevitable on this earth, shall no longer occasion their faith to lament, or their innocence to tremble. It is then that their lot, no longer connected with the unfaithful or the hypocrite, shall no more constrain them to be witnesses of their crimes, and sometimes even the involuntary agents of their passions. It is then that, all the bonds of society, of authority, or dependence, which attached them on this earth to the impious and to the worldly, being broken asunder, they shall no longer say, with the prophet, " Lord, why lengthenest thou out here
" our banishment and our sojourning? How long
" shall the land mourn, and the herbs of every " field wither for the wickedness of them that
" dwell therein?" Lastly, Then it is that their tears shall be changed into joy, and their sighs into thanksgivings; they shall pass to the right hand as the sheep, while the left shall be reserved for the goats and the impious.

The

The disposition of the universe thus laid out ; all nations of the earth thus divided ; each one fixed in the place allotted to him ; surprize, terror, despair, and confusion marked in the countenance of one part ; on that of the other, joy, serenity, and confidence : the eyes of the just raised on high towards the Son of Man, from whom they await their deliverance ; those of the impious frightfully fixed on the earth, and almost piercing the abyfs with their looks, as if already to mark out the place which is destined for them : the King of glory, says the gospel, placed in the middle of two nations, shall come forward ; and, turning towards those who shall be at his right hand, with an aspect full of sweetness and majesty, and sufficient of itself to console them for all their past sufferings, he will say to them, “ Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world. The sinful had always considered you as the outcast, and the most useless portion of the earth ; let them now learn that the world itself existed only for you, that all was created for you, and that all hath finished from the moment that your number was completed. Quit, then, an earth where you had always been travellers and strangers ; follow me into the immortal ways of my glory and felicity, as you have followed me in those of my humiliation and sufferings. Your toils have en“ dured

“dured but for an instant ; the happiness you go
“to enjoy shall be without end.”

Then, turning to the left hand, vengeance and fury in his eyes, here and there casting the most dreadful looks, like avenging thunderbolts, on that crowd of guilty ; with a voice, says a prophet, which shall burst open the bowels of the abyss to swallow them up, he shall say, not as upon the cross, Father, pardon them, for they know not what they do, but, “Depart from me, ye cursed, “into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and “his angels. You were the chosen of the earth,
“you are the cursed of my Father ; your pleasures
“have been fleeting and transitory, your anguish
“shall be eternal.” The just, then, mounting with the Son of Man, shall begin to sing this heavenly song, Thou art rich in mercy, Lord, and thou hast crowned thy gifts in recompensing our good actions. Then shall the impious curse the Author of their being, and the fatal day which brought them forth ; or, rather, they shall enter into wrath against themselves, as the authors of their misery and destruction. The abyss shall open ; the heavens shall bow down ; the reprobate, says the gospel, shall go into everlasting punishment, and the just into life eternal. Behold a lot which shall change no more.

After a relation so awful, and so proper to make an impression on the most hardened hearts, I cannot conclude without addressing to you the same words which Moses formerly addressed to the Israelites after having laid before them the dreadful threatenings, and the soothing promises contained in the Book of the Law. “ Children of Israel, behold I set before you this day a blessing and a curse : a blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you this day ; and a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the Lord your God, but turn aside, out of the way which I command you this day, to go after other gods which ye have not known.”

not

Behold, my brethren, what I say to you in concluding a subject so terrible. It now belongs to you to choose and to declare yourselves : the right hand and the left are before you : the promises and the threatenings : the blessings and the curses. Your destiny turns on this awful alternative : you either shall be on the side of Satan and his angels, or you shall be chosen with Jesus Christ and his saints. Here there is no middle way : I have pointed out the path which leads to life, and that which leads to perdition. In which of these two do you now walk ? And on which side do you believe that you should find yourselves, were you, at this moment, to appear before the awful tribunal ? We die as we have lived : tremble lest your destiny of this day be your everlasting destiny. Quit, and, from this moment, the ways of the sinful; begin now to live like the just, if you wish, on that last day, to be placed at the right hand, and to mount, along with them, into the abode of a blessed immortality.
and,

SER-

SERMON X.

THE HAPPINESS OF THE JUST.

MATTHEW V. 4.

Blessed are they who mourn, for they shall be comforted.

SIRE,

IF the world were to speak to you in place of Jesus Christ, it undoubtedly would not say, “blessed are they who mourn.”

Happy, would it say, the prince who has never fought but to conquer, and whose mind has always been superior either to the danger or to the victory: who, during the course of a long and a prosperous reign, has enjoyed, and still continues to enjoy, at his ease, the fruits of his glory, the love of his people, the esteem of his enemies, the advantage of his conquests, the splendour of his
his

his actions, the wisdom of his laws, and the august prospect of a numerous posterity ; and who has nothing left now to desire, but the continuance of what he possesses.

In this manner would the world speak ; but, Sire, Jesus Christ does not speak like the world.

Happy, says he to you, not him who is the admiration of his age ; but he who makes his study of the age to come, and lives in the contempt of himself and of all the things of the earth ; for to him is the kingdom of heaven. Not him whose reign and actions history will immortalize in the remembrance of men ; but he whose tears shall have effaced the history of his sins from the remembrance even of God ; for he shall be for ever consoled. Not him who, by new conquests, shall have extended the bounds of his empire ; but he who has succeeded in confining his desires and his passions within the limits of the law of God ; for he shall inherit a kingdom more durable than the empire of the universe. Not him who, exalted by the voice of nations above all preceding princes, tranquilly enjoys his greatness and his fame ; but he who, finding nothing even on the throne worthy of his heart, seeks no perfect happiness on this earth but in virtue and in righteousness ; for he shall be filled. Not him to whom men have given the pompous titles of great and invincible ; but he to whom the wretched shall give, before the tribunal of Jesus Christ, the title of father and of merciful; for he shall be treated with mercy. Lastly, Happy, not him who, always disposes of the lot of his enemies, has more than once given peace to the earth; but he who has been able to give it to himself, and to banish, from his heart, all the vices and disorderly inclinations which disturb its tranquility; for he shall be called a child of God.

Such, Sire, are those whom Jesus Christ calls happy: and the gospel acknowledges no other happiness on the earth than virtue and innocence.

Great God! it is not then that long train of unexampled prosperities, with which thou hast favoured the glory of his reign, that can render him the happiest of kings. He is thereby great; but he is not thereby happy. His felicity has commenced with his piety. Whatever does not sanctify man, can never make the happiness of man. Whatever does not place thee, O my God! in an heart, places only vanities which leave it empty, or real evils which fill it with disquiet; and a pure conscience is the only resource of real enjoyments.

It is to this truth that the church, on the occasion of this solemnity, confines its whole fruit. As the common error, that the life of the saints has been gloomy and disagreeable, is one of the principal artifices employed by the world in order to prevent us from imitating them, the church, in renewing their memory on this day, gives us to remember, at the same time, that not only they now enjoy an immortal felicity in heaven, but also that they have been the only happy of the earth, and that he who carries iniquity in his bosom always carries terror and anxiety ; and that the lot of the godly is a thousand times more tranquil and more satisfactory, even in this world, than that of sinners.
now

But, in what does the happiness of the just in this life consist ? It consists, 1stly, In the manifestation of truth concealed from the faces of the world. 2dly, In the relish of charity denied to the lovers of the world. In the lights of faith which soften all the sufferings of the believing soul, and which render those of the sinner still more bitter : this is my first point. In the comforts of grace which calm all the passions, and which, denied to a corrupted heart, leave it a prey to itself : is the last. Let us examine these two truths so calculated to render virtue amiable, and the example of the saints beneficial.

PART I. Our sorrows proceed, in general, from our errors ; and we are unhappy only because we are inadequate judges of what is really good and evil. The just, who are children of light, are, therefore, much happier than sinners, because they are more enlightened. The same lights which correct their judgments alleviate their sufferings : and faith, which shews the world to them such as it is, changes, into sources of consolation for them, the very same events in which souls, delivered up to the passions, find the principle of all their disquiets.

And, in order to make you sensible of a truth so honourable to virtue, observe, I pray you, my brethren, that, whether a contrite soul recall the past, and those times of error which preceded his penitence; whether he pay attention to what passes before his eyes in the world; or, lastly, whether he look forward to the future, every thing consoles, every thing strengthens him in the cause of virtue which he has adopted, every thing unites in rendering his condition infinitely more pleasing than that of a soul who lives in dissipation, and who finds, in these three situations, only bitterness and inward terrors.

For, in the first place, however the sinner may be delivered up to all fervency of his heart, he is not so violently hurried away, by present gratifications, but that he sometimes gives a look back to those years of iniquity which he amasses behind him. Those days of darkness, which he has consecrated to debauchery, have not so completely perished, but that, in certain moments, they obtrude themselves up his remembrance. Gloomy and troublesome images force themselves upon his soul, and, from time to time, arouse him from his lethargy by holding out, as if collected into one point, that shocking mass of crimes which make less impression, during their commission, because he only sees them in succession. At one glance of his eye he sees favours always contemned, inspirations always rejected, a vile perversion of a disposition naturally good and originally formed, it appears, for virtue; weaknesses at which he now blushes, phantoms and horrors against which he would wish for ever to shut his eyes.
his

Such is what the sinner leaves behind him. He is miserable if he look back to the past. His whole happiness is, as it were, shut up in the present moment; and, to be happy, he must never think, but allow himself, like the dumb creation, to be led away by the attraction of the present objects; and, to preserve his tranquility, he must either extinguish or brutify his reason. And thence those maxims so unworthy of humanity, and so circulated in the world; that too much reason is a sorry advantage; that reflections spoil all the pleasures of life; and, that, to be happy, the less we think the better. O man! was it for thy misery then that Heaven had given thee that reason by which thou art enlightened, or to assist thee in search of the truth, which alone can render thee happy? Could that divine light, which embellishes thy being, be a punishment rather than a gift of the Creator: And, should it so gloriously distinguish thee from the beast only that thy condition may be more wretched?

Yes, my brethren, such is the lot of an unbelieving soul. Intoxication, delirium of passion, and the extinction of all reason alone can render him happy;

happy ; and, as that situation is merely momentary, the instant the mind becomes calm and regains itself, the charm ceases, happiness takes wing, and man finds himself alone with his conscience and his crimes.

But how different, O my God ! is the lot of a soul who walks in thy ways, and how much to be pitied is the world which knows thee not ! In effect, the sweetest thoughts of a righteous soul are those by which the past is recalled. He there encounters, it is true, that portion of his life which had been engrossed by the world and the passions ; and the remembrance, I confess, fills him with shame before the sanctity of his God, and forces from him tears of compunction and sorrow. But, what consolation in his tears and in his grief !

For, my brethren, a contrite soul can never retrace the whole train of his past errors without discovering all the proceedings of God's mercy upon him. The singular ways by which his wisdom hath gradually, and, as it were, step by step, conducted him to the blessed moment of his conversion. So many unexpected favourable circumstances, so many accidents of disgrace, of loss, of death, of treachery, and of affliction ; all provided by a watchful Providence to facilitate the means of breaking asunder his chains. Those special attentions of God, even when in the paths of iniquity. Those disgusts, even in the midst of his pleasures, provided for him by his goodness. Those inward calls

calls which incessantly whispered to him, return to virtue and to duty. That internal monitor, which, go where he would, never left him, and unceasingly repeated to him, as formerly to St Augustin: Fool! How long wilt thou hunt after pleasures which can never make thee happy? When, by terminating thy crimes, wilt thou terminate thy troubles? What more is yet required to open thine eyes upon the world, than thine own experience itself, of thy weariness and unhappiness while serving it? Try if, in belonging to me, thou shalt not be more happy, and if I suffice not to fill the soul which possesses me?

Such is what the past offers to a contrite soul. It there sees the accomplices of its former pleasures still delivered up, by God's justice, to the errors of the world and of the passions, and it alone chosen, separated, and called to the knowledge of the truth.

With what peace and consolation does that reflection fill the believing soul! "How infinite, O my God," cries he with the prophet, "are thy mercies! Thou hast covered me in my mother's womb: Thou hast compassed my path, and my lying down, and all my ways have been known to thee: what have I done for thee more than so many other sinners whose eyes thou deignest not to open, and to manifest the severity of thy judgments and of thy justice? How marvellous, O God! are all thy works, and that my soul
 " knoweth

“ knoweth right well.” First advantage of righteous souls : the remembrance even of their past infidelities consoles them.

But, secondly, if they find sources of solid consolations in reviewing the past, their piety is not less comforted while viewing the present occurrences of the world. And here, my brethren, you will presently see how essentially requisite is virtue to the happiness of life, and how that very world, which gives birth to all the passions, and, consequently, to all the inquietudes of sinners, becomes the sweetest and most consolatory exercise of the faith of the just.

What indeed is the world even to the worldly themselves, who love it, who seem intoxicated with its delights, and who cannot do without it? The world? It is an eternal servitude where no one lives for himself, and where, in order to be happy, we must bring ourselves to hug our chains, and to love our slavery. The world? It is a daily revolution of events, which successively arouse, in the hearts of its partisans, the most violent and the most melancholy passions ; cruel antipathies, hateful perplexities, torturing fears, devouring jealousies, and corroding cares. The world? It is a land of curse, where even its pleasures are productive only of bitterness and thorns. Gaming fatigues and exhausts by its frenzies and by its caprices : conversation becomes wearysome through the contrariety of tempers and the opposition of sentiments :

ments : passions and criminal attachments are followed with their disgusts, their disappointments, and their unpleasent reports : theatres, no longer having as spectators but souls grossly dissolute and incapable of being roused but by the most shocking excesses of debauchery, become insipid while moving only those delicate passions, which only serve to shew guilt from afar, and to lay snares for innocence. Lastly, the world is a place where hope itself, considered as a passion so sweet and so pleasing, renders all men unhappy ; where those, who have nothing more to hope, believe themselves still more miserable ; where every thing that pleases soon ceases to please ; and where inanity or listless insipidity is almost the best and most supportable lot to be expected. Such is the world, my brethren ; nor is this that obscure world, to which neither the great pleasures, nor the charms of prosperity, of favour, and of affluence are known : it is the world in its most brilliant point of view ; it is the world of the court ; it is you yourselves who now listen to me. Such is the world ; nor is this one of those fanciful paintings of which the reality is no where to be found. I paint the world after your own heart, that is to say, such as you know it to be, and such as you yourselves continually experience it.

Such, nevertheless, is the place in which all sinners seek their happiness. That is their country. There they would willingly eternise themselves.

Such is that world which they prefer to the eternal inheritance, and to all the promises of faith. Great God! how just art thou in punishing man through his passions themselves, and to permit that, wishing to seek his happiness elsewhere than in thee who alone art the true peace of his heart, he form for himself a ridiculous felicity of his fears, his disgusts, his wearinesses, and his disquietudes!

But that which is so fortunate here for virtue, is that the same world, so tiresome and so insupportable to sinners who seek their happiness in it, becomes a source of the most soothing reflections to the righteous, who consider it as an exilement and a foreign land.

For, in the first place, the inconstancy of the world, so dreaded by those delivered up to it, supplies a thousand motives of consolation to the believing soul. Nothing appears to him either constant or durable upon the earth; neither the most flourishing fortunes, nor the warmest friendships, nor the most brilliant reputations, nor the most envied favour. He sees a sovereign wisdom through all, which delights, it would appear, in making a sport of men, by alternately exalting them on the ruins of each other; by hurling down those at the top of the wheel, in order to elevate those who, only a moment before, were groveling at the bottom; by introducing, every day, on the theatre of life new heroes to eclipse all those who formerly played on it so brilliant a part; by incessantly giving

new

new scenes to the universe. He sees men passing their whole life in ferments, projects, and plots; ever on the watch to surprize each other, or to avoid being surprized; always eager and active to profit of the retreat, the disgrace, or the death of a rival; and of these grand lessons, so fitted to inculcate contempt of the world, make only fresh motives of ambition and cupidity: always engrossed either by their fears or by their hopes; always uneasy either for the present or for the future; never tranquil, all struggling for quiet, yet every moment removing themselves farther and farther from it.

O man! why art thou so ingenious in rendering thyself miserable? Such is, then, the reflection of the believing soul. That happiness thou seekest is more easily attained. It is necessary neither to traverse seas nor to conquer kingdoms. Depart not from thyself and thou wilt be happy.

How sweet do the sorrows of virtue then appear to the godly man, when he compares them with the cruel chagrins and the endless agitations of sinners! How transported to have at last found a place of rest and of safety, while he sees the lovers of the world still sadly tost about at the mercy of the passions and of human hopes! Thus the Israelites formerly escaped from the danger of the Red sea, seeing from afar Pharaoh and all the nobility of Egypt still at the mercy of the waters, felt all the luxury of their own safety, thought the barren paths

paths of the desert delightful, and were insensible to every hardship of their journey ; and, comparing their lot with that of the Egyptians, far from giving vent to a complaint or a murmur, they sung with Moses that divine hymn of praise and of thanksgiving in which are celebrated, with such magnificence, the wonders and the tender mercies of the Lord.

2dly, The injustice of the world, so humbling to those who love it, when they see themselves forgotten, neglected, and sacrificed to unworthy rivals, is also a fund of soothing reflections to a soul who despises it and fears only the Lord. For, what resource is left to a sinner who, after having sacrificed his ease, his conscience, his wealth, his youth, and his health, to the world and to his masters ; after having submitted in silence to every circumstance the most mortifying to the mind, sees at once, and without knowing why, the gates of favour and advancement for ever shut against him ; sees places snatched from him to which he was entitled by his services, and of which he thought himself already certain ; threatened, should he dare to murmur, with the loss of those he still enjoys ; forced to crouch to more fortunate rivals, and to be at the beck of those whom, only a little before, he had deemed unworthy of even receiving his orders ? Shall he retire far from the world, to evaporate, in continual invectives against it, the spleen and the rancour of his heart, and thus revenge himself himself of the injustice of men? But of what avail will be his retirement? It will afford only more leisure for retrospection, and fewer relaxations from chagrin. Shall he try to console himself with similar examples? But our misfortunes never, as we think, resemble those of others; and, besides, what consolation can it be to have our sorrows renewed by seeing their image reflected from others? Shall he entrench himself in strength of mind, and in a vain philosophy? But, in solitude, reason soon descends from its pride; we may be philosophers for the public, but we are only men with ourselves. Shall he fly, as a resource, to voluptuousness, and to other infamous pleasures? But, in changing the passion, the heart only changes the punishment. Shall he seek, in indolence and inactivity, an happiness he has never been able to find in all the fervency of hopes and pretensions? A criminal conscience may become indifferent, but it is not thereby more tranquil. One may cease to feel misfortune and disgrace, but infidelities and crimes must always be felt. No, my brethren, the unhappy sinner is so without resource. Every comfort is for ever fled from the worldly soul from the moment that he is deserted by the world.

But the righteous man learns to despise the world even in the contempt which the world has for him. The injustice of men, with respect to him, only puts him in mind that he serves a more equitable Master, who can neither be influenced nor prejudiced; prejudiced ; who sees nothing in us but what, in reality, there is ; who determines our destinies upon our hearts alone, and with whom we have nothing but our own conscience to dread : consequently, that they are happy who serve him ; that his ingratitude is not to be feared ; that every thing done for him is faithfully recorded ; that, far from concealing or neglecting our sufferings and our services, he gives us credit even for our good wishes ; and that nothing is lost with him but what is not done solely for him.

Now, in these lights of faith, what a fresh fund of consolation for a believing soul ! How little is the world, in this point of view, with all its scorns and ill usage, capable of affecting him ! Then it is that, throwing himself into the bosom of God, and viewing, with Christian eyes, the nothingness and vanity of all human things, he feels in a moment all his inquietudes, inseparable from nature, changed into the sweetest peace ; a ray of light shines in his soul, and re-establishes serenity ; a trait of consolation penetrates his heart, and every sorrow is alleviated. Ah ! my brethren, how sweet to serve him, who alone can render happy those who serve him ! Why, O blessed condition of virtue, art thou not better known to men ! And wherefore art thou held out as a disagreeable and sorrowful lot, thou who alone canst console the miseries and alleviate all the sufferings of this banishment ?

Lastly,

Lastly, The judgments of the world, source of so many chagrins for the wordly, complete still more the consolation of the believing soul. For the torture of the lovers of the world is that of being continually exposed to the judgments, that is to say, to the censures, to the derisions, to the malignity of each other. In vain do we despise the men: we wish to be esteemed even by those we despise. In vain are we exalted above others: the more we are exalted, we are only the more exposed to the criticisms and to the observations of the multitude, and we much more poignantly feel the censures of those from whom homages alone were to have been expected. In vain may the suffrage of the public be in our favour; contempt is so much the more stinging as it is unusual and rare. In vain may we retaliate with censures yet more biting and keen; resentment and revenge always suppose a sense of guilt; and, besides, the chagrin of having encountered scorn is much more lively than any pleasure that can accrue from retorting it. Lastly, From the moment that you live solely for the world, and that your pleasures or your vexations depend wholly on it, the judgments of the world can never be indifferent to you.

Nevertheless, it is in the midst of all these vexations that happiness must be at least professed. Every thing attributed to you, either by truth or vanity, is called in question: your birth, your talents, lents, your reputation, your services, your success, your prudence, and even your honour. If you go to wreck, your incapacity accounts for it: if successful, the honour is given to chance, or to your inferiors: if you enjoy the good opinion of the public, the judgment of the more knowing is appealed to from the popular error; if possessed of the art of pleasing, it is immediately said that you have made a thorough use of your talents, and that you have been only too agreeable: if your conduct be superior to any attack, the most poignant ridicule is directed against your temper. Lastly, Be whom ye may, high or low, prince or subject, the most desirable situation for your vanity is that of being unacquainted with the world's opinion of you. Such is the life of the world. The same passions which bind us together, disunite us: envy and destruction blacken our noblest qualities; and our gratifications find censurers even in those who copy them.

But a believing soul is sheltered from all these uneasinesses. As he courts not the esteem of men, neither does he fear their scorn; as he has no intention of laying himself out to please, neither is he surpris'd to find that he has not done it. God, who sees him, is the only Judge he fears, and who, at the same time, consoles him for the judgments of men. His glory is the testimony of his own conscience. His reputation he seeks in the fulfilment of his duty. He considers the suffrages of the world, as the rock of virtue, or as the reward of vice; and, without even paying attention to its judgments, he is satisfied with giving it good examples. But what do I say, my brethren? The world itself, all worldly as it is, so full of censures, malignity, and contempt for its own worshippers, is forced to respect the virtue of those who hate and despise it. It appears that virtue imprints, on the person of a real righteous man, a dignity, a something I know not what, of divine, which attracts the veneration and almost the worship of worldly souls: it appears that his intimate union with Jesus Christ occasions his being irradiated, as I may say, like the three disciples on the holy mount, with a part of that celestial splendour which the Father shed around his well-beloved Son, and by which all liberty ceases of refusing homage. It is an inalienable right which virtue has over the heart of men; and, by a deplorable caprice, the world despises the passions it inspires, and respects the virtue it strives against. Not that the esteem of the world, so worthy itself of being despised, can be any great consolations to the believing soul. But his consolation is, that he sees the world condemned even by the world, its pleasures decried even by those who hunt after them, sinners become the apologists of virtue, and the life of the world to pass sorrowfully away in doing what they condemn, and flying from what they approve.
the

Such is the manner in which the present age becomes a source of consolatory reflections to a Christian soul ; but, in the thought of futurity, he also finds consolations which are changed into inward and continual terrors for sinners : Last advantage drawn by the just from the lights of faith. The magnificence of its promises sustains and consoles them : they await the blessed hope, and that happy moment when they shall be associated with the church of heaven, reunited to their brethren whom they had left on the earth, received eternal citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, incorporated in that immortal assembly of the elect, where charity will be the law that shall unite them ; truth, the flame that shall enlighten them ; and eternity, the measure of their felicity.

These thoughts are so much the more consoling to the godly, as they are founded on the truth of God himself. They know that, in sacrificing the present, they sacrifice nothing ; that, in the twinkling of an eye all shall have passed away ; that, whatever must have an end cannot long endure ; that this moment of tribulation ought to be reckoned as nothing, when put in competition with that eternal weight of glory which he prepareth for us ; and that the rapid passage of present things scarcely deserves that we should be at the pains of numbering the years and the ages.

I know that faith may subsist with criminal manners ; and that the sanctifying grace is often
lost

lost without losing a sincere submission to the truths revealed to us by the Spirit of God. But the certitude of faith, so consoling to the righteous soul, is no longer for the sinner who still believes but an inexhaustible fund of inward anxieties and cruel terrors. For, the more that sinners like you, who bear upon your conscience the sink of a whole life of irregularity, are convinced of the truths of faith, the more inevitable must the punishments and the misery appear with which it threatens such sinners. All the truths offered to your faith, in the holy doctrine, excite fresh alarms in your breast. Those divine lights, which are the source of all consolation to believing souls, become, within you, only avenging lights which disquiet, agonise, and judge you; which, like a mirror, hold up continually to your sight what you would wish never to see; which enlighten you, in spite of yourselves, on what you would wish to be for ever ignorant. Your faith itself constitutes your punishment before-hand. Your religion is, here below, if I may venture to say so, your hell; and, the more you are convinced of the truth, the more unhappy do you live. O God! how great is thy goodness towards man, in having rendered virtue necessary even to his quiet, and in thus attracting him to thee, by making it impossible for him to be happy without thee!

And here, my dear hearer, allow me to recall you to yourself. When the lot of a criminal soul
should

should not be so fearful for the age to come, see if, even in this world, it appears much to be envied : his afflictions are without resource, his evils without consolation, even his pleasures without enjoyment ; his anxieties upon the present endless, his reflections on the past and on the future gloomy and sad ; his faith is the source of all his anguish ; his lights of all his despair. What a situation ! What a miserable lot ! What shocking changes are operated, by a single act of guilt, both internally and outwardly on man ! How dearly does he purchase eternal misery ! And, is it not true that the way of the world and of the passions is still infinitely more arduous and painful than that of the gospel ; and that there is more toil and vexation of spirit in gaining the kingdom of hell, if it be proper to speak in this manner, than in gaining the kingdom of heaven ? O innocence of heart, what blessings dost thou not bring with thee to man ! O man, what lovest thou not when thou lovest thine innocence of heart ! Thou lovest all the consolations of faith, the sweetest occupation of the piety of the righteous ; but thou also deprivest thyself of all the comforts of grace by which the lot of the godly is rendered so truly enviable here below.

PART II. When comforts and consolation, says St Augustin, are promised to worldly souls in the observance of the law of God, they consider our promises as a pious mode of speaking employed to give credit and consequence to virtue; and, as a heart which has never tasted of these chaste delights is also incapable of comprehending them, we are obliged, continues that holy father, to reply to them, "How wouldst thou that we convince thee?" We cannot say unto thee: "O taste and see that the Lord is good!" seeing a diseased and vitiated heart can have no relish for the things in heaven. Give us an heart that loves, and it will feel the truth of every thing we say.
give

My design, therefore, here, is not so much to enlarge upon all the inward operations of grace in the heart of the just, as to contrast the happy situation in which it places them, here below, with the melancholy lot of sinners, and, by this comparison, to overwhelm vice and to encourage virtue. Now, I say, that grace provides two kinds of consolations here below to the godly: the one internal and secret, the others external and sensible; both of them so essential to happiness in this life, that no earthly gratification can ever compensate for them.

The first internal benefit accruing to the believing soul from grace, is the establishment of a solid peace in his heart, and a reconciliation with himself. For, my brethren, we all bear within us natural principles of equity, of modesty, and of rectitude. We come into the world, as the apostle says, with the precepts of the law written in the heart. If virtue be not our first bent, we, at least, feel that it is our first duty. In vain does passion sometimes

sometimes undertake secretly to persuade us that we are born for pleasure ; and that, after all, tendencies implanted by nature, and which every one finds within himself, can never be crimes. This foreign persuasion is ineffectual in quieting the criminal soul. It is a desire, for we would heartily wish to be lawful whatever pleases us ; but it is not a real conviction. It is a saying, for it appears honourable to be above all vulgar prejudices ; but it is not a feeling. Thus we always carry within us an incorruptible judge, who incessantly adopts the cause of virtue against our dearest inclinations ; who blends with our most headstrong passions the troublesome ideas of duty ; and, who renders us unhappy even amidst all our pleasures and abundance.

Such is the state of an impure and a fullied conscience. The sinner is the secret and constant accuser of himself ; go where he will, he carries a torment within which the hand of man cannot allay. Unhappy in being unable to conquer his lawless tendencies : more unhappy still in being unable to stifle his incessant remorse. Enticed by his weakness, and withheld by his lights, the permission of every crime is a conflict with himself : he reproaches himself for the iniquitous gratification, even in the moment of its enjoyment. What shall he do ? Shall he combat his lights in order to appease his conscience ? Shall he suspect his faith to sin in tranquility ? But unbelief is still a more horrible rible state than even guilt. To live without God, without worship, without principle, and without hope! To believe that the most abominable transgressions and the purest virtues are merely names! To consider all men as only the vile and fantastical puppets of a low theatre, and merely intended for the amusement of the spectators! To consider himself as the offspring of chance, and the eternal possession of nonentity! These thoughts have something, I know not what, of gloomy and horrible, that the soul cannot look upon without horror; and it is true that unbelief is rather the despair of the sinner than the refuge of the sin. What, then, shall he do? Continually obliged to fly himself, lest he find himself alone with his conscience, he ranges from object to object, from passion to passion, from precipice to precipice. He thinks to compensate the emptiness and the insufficiency of pleasures by their variety; there is none which he does not try. But in vain is his heart successively offered to all the created; all the objects of his passions reply to him, says St Augustin, "Deceive not thyself in loving us; we are not that happiness of which thou art in search; we cannot render thee happy: raise thyself above the created, and, mounting to heaven, see if he who hath formed us be not greater and more worthy of being loved than we." Such is the lot of the sinner.

Not that the heart of the just enjoys a tranquillity so unalterable but that they, in their turn, experience

perience troubles, disgusts, and anxieties here below. But these are passing clouds, which shade, as I may say, only the surface of their soul. A profound calm always reigns within; that serenity of conscience, that simplicity of heart, that equality of mind, that lively confidence, that mild resignation, that calm of the passions, that universal peace, which begins, even from this life, the felicity of innocent souls. Vain creatures, what can ye, over an heart which you have not made, and which is not made for you? First consolation of grace, viz. peace of heart.

The second is love, which mollifies to the just all the rigours of the law, and, according to the promise of Jesus Christ, changes his yoke, so insupportable to sinners, into a sweet and consoling yoke for them. For a believing soul loves his God still more fervently, more tenderly, and more truly, than he had ever loved the world. Every thing, therefore, even the most rigorous, that he undertakes for him, is either no longer a trial to his heart, or becomes its sweetest care. For the attribute of the holy love, when master of the heart, is either to mollify the sufferings it occasions, or to change them even into holy pleasures. Thus a soul enamoured of God, if I may dare to speak in this manner, pardons with joy, suffers with confidence, mortifies itself with pleasure, flies from the world with delight, prays with consolation, and fulfils every duty with an holy satisfaction. The more

more his love increases, the more does his yoke become easy. The more he loves the happier he is: for it is the height of happiness to love what is become essential and necessary to us.

But, the sinner, the more he loves the world the more unhappy he is: for the more he loves the world the more do his passions multiply, the more do his desires inflame, the more do his schemes get perplexed, and the more do his anxieties become sharpened. His love is the cause of all his evils: its vivacity is the source of all his sufferings; because the world, which is the cause of them, is incapable of furnishing him with their cure. The more he loves the world the more is his pride stung by a preference; the more does his haughtiness feel an injury, the more does he sink under a disconcerted project; the more does a disappointed desire afflict him, the more does an unexpected loss weigh him down. The more he loves the world the more do pleasures become necessary to him; and, as no one can fill the immensity of his heart, the more insupportable does his weariness become: for weariness is the inseparable attendant of every pleasure; and, with all its amusements, the world, ever since it was a world, complains of its lassitude.

And think not that, to accredit virtue, I here affect to exaggerate the misery of worldly souls. I know that the world seems to have its happiness; and that, amid all that whirlwind of cares, motions, fears, and anxieties, a small number of fortunate fortunate individuals is seen, whose happiness is envied, and who seem, in appearance, to enjoy a smiling and tranquil lot. But investigate these vain outwards of happiness and gladness, and you will find real sorrows, distracted hearts, and agitated consciences. Draw near to these men who, in your eyes, appear the happy of the earth, and you will be surprised to find them gloomy, anxious, and sinking under the weight of a criminal conscience. Hear them in those serious and tranquil moments, when the passions, more cooled, allow some influence to reason: they all confess that they are any thing but happy, that the blaze of their fortune shines only at a distance, and appears worthy of envy only to those who know it not. They confess that, amidst all their pleasures and prosperity, they have never been able to taste any pure and unadulterated joy; that the world, a little searched into, is nothing; that they are astonished themselves how it can be loved when known; and that happy are they alone, here below, who can do without it and serve God. Some long for the opportunity of an honourable retreat; others are continually proposing to themselves more orderly and more Christian manners. All admit the happiness of the godly; all wish to become so; all bear testimony against themselves. They are the forced rather than the voluntary followers of pleasure. It is no longer inclination, it is habit, it is weakness which retains them in the shackles of the world and of sin. They feel this; they lament it; they acknowledge it; and they give way to the current of so wretched a lot. Deceitful world! render happy, if in thy power, those who serve thee, and then will I forsake the law of the Lord to attach myself to the vanity of thy promises.

and

You yourself, my dear hearer, since the many years that you serve the world, have you greatly forwarded your happiness? Put in a balance, on the one side, all the agreeable moments and days you have passed in it, and, on the other, all the sorrows and vexations you have there experienced, and see which scale will preponderate. In certain moments of pleasure, of excess, and of frenzy, you have, perhaps, said, "It is good for us to be here;" but that was only a momentary intoxication, the illusion of which the following moment discovered to you, and plunged you into all your former anxieties. Even now, when speaking to you, question your own heart: are you at peace within; is nothing wanting to your happiness? Do you fear, do you wish for nothing? Do you never feel that God is not with you? Would you wish to live and die such as you are? Are you satisfied with the world? Are you unfaithful to the Author of your being without remorse? There are twelve hours in the day; are they all equally agreeable to you? And have you, as yet, been able to succeed in fashioning a conscience so as to remain tranquil in guilt?

Even

Even then, when you have plunged to the very bottom of the sea of iniquity to extinguish your remorse, and have succeeded, as you thought, in stifling that remnant of faith which still pleads in your heart for virtue, hath not the Lord commanded the serpent, as he saith in his prophet Amos, to follow and sting you even in the abyss where you had fled for shelter? And, even there, have you not felt the secret gnawings of the ravenous worm? Is it not true that the days you have consecrated to God by some religious duty have been the happiest of your life; and that you have never lived, as I may say, but when your conscience has been pure, and that you have lived with God? No, says the prophet with an holy pride, the God whom we worship is not a deceitful God, nor is he, like the gods which the world worships, unable to reward those who serve him: let the worldly themselves be the judges here.

Great God! What then is man, thus to wrestle his whole life against himself, to wish to be happy without thee, in spite of thee, in declaring himself against thee; to feel his wretchedness, and yet to love it; to know his true happiness, and yet to fly from it? What is man, O my God! and who shall fathom his ways, and the eternal contradiction of his errors?

Would I could finish what I had at first intended, and prove to you, my brethren, that the lot of the godly is still more worthy of all our wishes for this reason, that, when the internal consolations happen even to fail them, yet they have the external aids of piety to strengthen and to assist them: the support of the sacrament, which, to the reluctant sinner, is no longer but a melancholy tribute to decency, equally tiresome and embarrassing: the example of the holy, and the history of their wonders, from which the sinner averts his eyes, lest he see in them his own condemnation: the holy thanksgivings and prayers of the church, which, to the sinner, become a melancholy fatigue: and, lastly, the consolation of the divine writings, in which he no longer finds but menaces and anathemas.
this

What invigorating refreshment, in effect, my brethren, to the mind of a believer, when, after quitting the vain conversations of the world, where the only subjects have been the exaltation of a family, the magnificence of a building, the individuals who act a brilliant part on the theatre of the universe, public calamities, the faults of those at the head of affairs, the events of war, and the errors with which the government is continually accused; lastly, where, earthly, they have spoken only of the earth; what a refreshment after quitting these, when, in order to breathe a little from the fatigue of these vain conversations, a believing soul takes up the book of the law, and finds every where in it; that it matters little to man to have gained the whole world, if he thereby lose his soul; that the most vaunted conquests shall sink into oblivion, livion with the vanity of the conquerors ; that the heavens and the earth shall pass away ; that the kingdoms of the earth and all their glory shall waste away like a garment ; but that God alone will endure for ever ; and, consequently, that to him alone we ought to attach ourselves ! The fool-ists have repeated vain things to me, O my God ! says then this soul with the prophet ; but O how different from thy law !

And certainly, my brethren, what soothing promises in these holy books ! What powerful inducements to virtue ! What happy precautions against vice ! What instructive events ! What sublime ideas of the greatness of God, and of the wretchedness of man ! What animated paintings of the deformity of sin, and the false happiness of sinners ! We have no need of thine assistance, wrote Jonathan and all the Jewish people to the Spartans, for, having the holy books in our hands to comfort us, we have no occasion for the aid of men. And who, think you, my brethren, were these men who speak in this manner ? They were the unfortunate remains of Antiochus's cruelty, wandering in the mountains of Judea, despoiled of their property and fortunes, driven from Jerusalem and the temple where the abomination of idols had taken place of the worship of the holy God ; and, scarcely emerged from so afflicting a situation, they are in need of nothing, for they have the holy books in their hands. And, in an extremity so new, surrounded on all hands by nations of enemies, having no longer, in the midst of their army, either the ark of Israel or the holy tabernacle; their tears still flowing for the recent death of the invincible Judas, who was alike the safeguard of the people and the terror of the uncircumcised; having seen their wives and children murdered before their eyes; they themselves on the point every day of sinking under the treachery of their false brethren, or the ambuscades of their enemies; the book of the law is alone sufficient to comfort and to defend them; and they think themselves in a situation to disclaim that assistance which an ancient treaty and alliance entitled them to demand.

I am not surpris'd after this, that, in the consolation of the scriptures, the first disciples of the gospel should forget all the rage of persecution; and that unable to bring themselves to lose sight of that divine book during life, they should desire it to be inclosed in their tomb after death, as if to guarantee to their ashes that immortality it had always promised to them; and likewise, as it would appear, to present it to Jesus Christ on the day of revelation, as the sacred claim by which they were entitled to heavenly riches, and to all the promises made to the righteous.

Such are the consolations of believing souls upon the earth. How terrible then, my brethren, to live

live far from God under the tyranny of sin ; always at war with one's self ; destitute of every real joy of the heart ; without relish often for pleasures alike as for virtue ; odious to men through the meanness of our passions ; insupportable to ourselves through the capriciousness of our desires ; hated of God through the horrors of our conscience : deprived of the comforts of the sacrament, seeing our crimes permit us not to approach it ; deprived of all consolation from the holy books, seeing we find in them only threatenings and anathemas ; without the resource of prayer, seeing the practice of it is forbidden, or, at least, the habit of it lost by a life wholly dissolute. What then is the sinner but the outcast of heaven and of the earth !

Thus, know ye, my brethren, what shall be the regrets of the reprobate on that great day, when to each one shall be rendered according to his works ? You probably think that they will regret their past felicity, and shall say, “ Our days of prosperity have flit away like a shadow, and that world, in which we had spent so many sweet moments, is now no more : the duration of our pleasures has been like that of a dream : our happiness is flown, but, alas ! our punishments are to begin.” You are mistaken ; this will not be their language. Hear how they speak in the book of Wisdom, and such, as we are assured

ed by the Spirit of God, they shall one day speak, “ We never tasted pure delight in guilt ; we have “ erred from the ways of truth, and the Sun of “ righteousness hath never rose upon us : alas !
“ and yet that was only the beginning of our mis“ fortunes and sufferings ; we wearied ourselves “ in the way of wickedness and destruction ; our “ passions have always been a thousand times “ more intolerable to us than could ever have “ been the most austere virtues ; and we have suf“ fered more in working our own destruction, than “ would have been necessary to secure our salva“ tion, and to be entitled to mount up now with “ the chosen into the realms of immortality.
“ Fools that we are ! by a sorrowful and unhappy “ life to have purchased miseries which must en“ dure for ever !”

Would you then, my dear hearer, live happy on the earth ; live Christianly. Piety is universally beneficial. Innocence of heart is the source of true pleasures. Turn to every side ; there is no rest, says the Spirit of God, for the wicked. Try every pleasure ; they will never eradicate that disease of the mind, that fund of lassitude and gloom which, go where you will, continually accompanies you. Cease then to consider the lot of the godly as a disagreeable and sorrowful lot ; judge not of their happiness from appearances which deceive you. You see their countenance bedewed with tears ; but you see not the invisible hand which wipes them away : you see their body groaning under the yoke of penitence ; but you see not the unction of grace which mollifies it : you see sorrowful and austere manners ; but you see not a conscience always cheerful and tranquil. They are like the ark in the desert : it appeared covered only with the skins of animals : the exterior is mean or disgusting ; it is the condition of that melancholy desert. But, could you penetrate into the heart, into that divine sanctuary ; what new wonders would rise to your eyes ! You would find it clothed in pure gold : you would there see the glory of God with which it is filled : you would there admire the fragrance of the perfumes, and the fervor of the prayers which are continually mounting upwards to the Lord ; the sacred fire which is never extinguished on that altar ; that silence, that peace, that majesty which reigns there ; and the Lord himself, who hath chosen it for his abode, and who hath delighted in it.

Let their lot inspire you with an holy emulation. It depends wholly on yourself to be similar to them. They perhaps have formerly been the accomplices of your pleasures ; why could you not become the imitator of their penitence ? Establish, at last, a solid peace in your heart : begin to be weary of yourself. Hitherto you have only half-lived ; for it is not living to live at enmity with one's self. Return to your God who calls and who expects you : banish iniquity from your soul, and you will banish the source of all its sorrows ; you will enjoy the peace of innocence ; you will live happy upon the earth ; and that temporal happiness will be only the commencement of a felicity which shall never fade nor be done away.
banish

SER.

SERMON XI.

ON THE DISPOSITIONS FOR THE COMMUNION.

LUKE iii. 4.

Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight.

BEHOLD what the church is continually repeating to us during this holy time, in order to prepare us for the birth of Jesus Christ : prepare, says she to all her children, prepare the way of the Lord who descends from heaven to visit and to redeem his people ; make his paths straight ; let the hollows be filled up and the mountains levelled ; let the crooked ways become straight and the rugged even. Or, to express the same meaning without metaphor ; prepare yourselves, says she to us, to gather the fruit of that grand mystery which we are going to celebrate, by humiliation of heart, meekness and charity, rectitude of intention, uniformity of living, renunciation of your own wisdom and of your own righteousness; mortifying the flesh and humbling the spirit.
are

Allow me to hold the same language to you Christians, my brethren, who, on this solemn occasion, come to purify yourselves in the penitential tribunals, in order to give a new birth to Jesus Christ in your hearts, on receiving him at the sacred table: prepare the way of the Lord. The deed you are going to perform is the most holy act of religion, and the source of the most special favours: undertake it not, therefore, without all the cares and all the precautions which it requires; do not expose yourselves, through your own fault, to lose the inestimable advantages which ought to accrue to you from it.

The communion ought to give birth to Jesus Christ in our hearts; but where would be the difference between the righteous man and the sinner, between the soul who discerns the body of the Lord, and him who treats it as a common food; were he equally to have birth in the heart of all who receive him? Deceive not yourselves then, my brethren; there is a way of receiving Jesus Christ, by which his presence is rendered useless to us; and would to God that, in thus receiving him, we deprived ourselves only of those favours which follow an holy communion! Ah! my brethren, thren, unless the communion gives birth to Jesus Christ in our hearts, it brings death to him there; if it do not render us participators of his spirit and of his grace, it is the sentence of our condemnation; if it be not a fruit of life to our soul, it is a fruit of death: terrible alternative which ought to excite our fears, but which ought not entirely to keep us away from the sacred table. The bread which is there distributed is the true nourishment of our souls, the strength of the strong, the support of the weak, the consolation of the afflicted, the pledge of a blessed immortality: how dangerous would it then be to abstain from it? But, infinitely more so would it be to eat it without preparation. On that account I again repeat to you, my dearest brethren, with the church, "Prepare the way of the Lord:" let your preparations for receiving him be of long standing; banish from your hearts whatever may offend him; instruct yourselves in the dispositions which he exacts of those who receive him; use every effort to acquire them; there is no other mean of avoiding the risk of an unworthy communion, and of attracting Jesus Christ into your souls.

This is an important matter, which demands all your attention. On one side, there is question of making you shun the horrible crime of profaning the body and the adorable blood of Jesus Christ; on the other, of instructing you how to reap from the communion all the grace which it is capable of of bringing forth in our hearts. What, then, are those preparations so essential towards a profitable and worthy communion? I reduce them to four, which shall be the subject and the division of this discourse.

REFLECTION I. The eucharist is an hidden manna; it is the food of the strong, a sensible and permanent testimony of the love of Jesus Christ, the continuation and the fulfilment of his sacrifice. Now, it is necessary to know how to discern this hidden manna from common food, lest it be taken unworthily: first preparation. It is the food of the strong; we ought, therefore, to examine ourselves before we venture to make use of it: second preparation. The testimony of the love of Jesus Christ; it can be received, therefore, only in remembrance of him, that is to say, in feeling aroused in his presence every tender and exquisite sensation which can be excited by the remembrance of a dear and beloved object: third preparation. It is the fulfilment of his sacrifice; every time, therefore, that we participate in it, we shew his death, and we ought to bring there a spirit of the cross and of martyrdom: fourth preparation. A respectful faith which enables us to discern, a prudent faith which makes us to examine, an ardent faith which enables us to love, an exalted faith which makes us to immolate; this is the summary of the apostle's doctrine, in relating to us the institution of the eucharist, and likewise that of all the faints faints with regard to the use of that adorable sacrament.

First preparation : a respectful faith which makes us to discern. Think not, my brethren, that I mean here to speak of that faith which distinguishes us from unbelievers. Where is the merit of believing when the prejudices of childhood have accustomed reason to it, and when belief is, as it were, born with us ? Exertion would even be necessary to cast off its yoke ; and, to pass from faith to error, a greater effort is perhaps required than to return from error to the truth. I speak of that lively faith which pierces through the clouds, which surround the throne of the Lamb ; which sees him not mystically, and, as it were, through a glass, but face to face, if I may venture to say so, such as he is : of that faith which, in spite of the veil with which the true Moses covers himself on this holy mountain, fails not, however, to perceive all his glory, and to feel the inability of supporting his presence : of that faith which, without rashly examining into his majesty, is, nevertheless, overpowered with its lustre ; which sees the celestial legions covering themselves with their wings, and the pillars of the firmament shaking before this King of terrible majesty : of that faith to which the senses could add nothing, and which is blessed, not because it believes without seeing, but because it almost sees in believing. I speak of that respectful faith which is seized with a religious trembling at

at the sole presence of the sanctuary, which approaches the altar as Moses did the burning bush and the Israelites the thundering mountain; of that faith which feels the whole weight of God's presence, and, in fear, cries out like Peter, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." I speak of that faith of which the respect approaches almost to dread, and which it is even necessary to comfort; which, from the farthest spot that it discovers Jesus Christ upon the altar, feels an eclat of majesty which strikes and agitates it, and overpowers it with the dread of having ventured to come there without his order.

Behold, my brethren, what that discernment of faith is which the apostle demands of you. Great God! but doth any faith like this still remain upon the earth? Ah! in vain dost thou still manifest thy presence to the world; it knows thee no better than formerly: thy disciples themselves often know thee but according to the flesh; and, by being constantly with thee, their eyes become habituated, and almost no longer discern thee. When thou shalt shew thyself in the heavens upon a bright cloud, men shall be consumed with terror, and the impious shall seek to hide themselves in the deepest caverns, and shall entreat the mountains to cover their heads: ah! art thou not the same in the sanctuary as upon a cloud of glory? Are the heavens not opened above thee? When the priest pronounces the awful words, do not the heavenly spirits come down from heaven to officiate as thy servants, and to surround thee with their homages? Dost thou not judge men upon that mysterious tribunal, and cast looks of discernment upon that multitude of worshippers which fills thy temples? Dost thou not separate the goats from the sheep? Dost thou not there pronounce sentences of life and death? In one hand dost thou not hold thy wrath, and in the other crowns? Dost thou not separate me there, and stamp, with an invisible hand, upon my forehead the mark of my election or of my eternal reprobation? Alas! and, while thou art perhaps condemning me, I have the presumption to draw near; while thou art casting me off from before thee, I boldly present myself there; while thou perhaps layest open the abyss to mark out my place, I impudently come to take it at thy table; while thou perhaps art ranging me with the children of wrath, I come to seat myself among the children of thy love: thy body, which giveth life, to me is a body of death; the Lamb without stain, which breaks the seven seals of the book of death, is the last seal which fills up and closes that of mine iniquities; and thou, who shouldst be my Saviour, becomest my guilt.

Ah! my brethren, God could not be seen in former times without instant death being the consequence. A whole people of Bethshamites was exterminated for having only too curiously examined the ark: the angel of the Lord covers Heliodorus liodorus with wounds, because he had dared to enter into the sanctuary of Jerusalem: the Israelites in the desert were not permitted even to approach the holy mountain from whence the Lord gave out his law; the thunders of heaven defended its access; terror and death every where preceded the face of the God of Abraham. What! because whirlwinds of fire no longer burst forth to punish the intruders and the profaners of our sanctuaries, respect and dread no longer accompany us there! Weak men, over whom the senses have such dominion, and who are never religious but when the God whom they worship is clothed in terror! For, say, were we to discern the body of the Lord; did the faith of his presence make those grand impressions upon us which it would undoubtedly do were we openly to see him; ah! would we tranquilly and almost unfeelingly come to seat ourselves at his table? Should a few moments, employed in reciting, with a languid heart and an absent mind, some slight formula, prepare us for an action so awful? Should a communion be the business of an idle morning perhaps gained from a customary slumber, or the vain cares of dress? Ah! the thoughts of it should long previously occupy and affect us: time should even be necessary to strengthen us, if I may venture to say so, against our own feelings of respect, and against the idea of his majesty: the days previous to this sacred festival should be days of retirement, of silence, lence, of prayer, and of mortification : every day which brings us nearer to that blessed term, should witness the increase of our anxieties, our fears, our joy. The thoughts of it should be mingled with all our affairs, all our conversations, all our meals, all our relaxations, and even with our sleep itself : our mind, filled with faith, should feel its inability to pay attention to any thing else ; we should no longer perceive but Jesus Christ : that image alone should fix all our attention. Behold what is called to discern the body of the Lord.

I know that a worldly soul experiences inward agitations at the approach of a solemnity in which decency, and perhaps the law, require his presence at the altar. But, O my God ! thou who fathomest these troubled hearts, are such those religious terrors of faith which should accompany an humble creature to thy altar ? Ah ! it is a sadness which operates death ; these are inquietudes which spring from the embarrassments of a conscience which requires to be cleared. They are gloomy and sad, like the young man of the gospel, whom thou orderedst to follow thee : they dread these blessed days as fatal days : they look upon, as dark and gloomy mysteries, all the solemnities of Christians : the delights of thy feast become a fatigue to them : they only partake of it like the blind and the lame of the gospel : that is to say, that the laws of thy church must drag these faithless souls, as if by force, from the public places, from the pleasures of the age, and from the high way of perdition, and bring them, in spite of themselves, into the hall of thy feast : they delay, as much as possible, this religious duty ; the sole thought of it empoyons all their pleasures. Thou seest these unbelieving souls dragging on the load of a wavering conscience ; long hesitating betwixt their duties and their passions ; softening at last, by the choice of an indulgent confessor, the bitterness of this step ; appearing before thee, O God, who becomest their nourishment in this mystery of love, with as much reluctance as if they went to face an enemy ; and, perhaps, in the course of a whole year, experiencing no other circumstance to grieve them than that of receiving a God who gives himself to them. Ah ! Lord, therefore, thou invisibly rejectest these guilty victims who oblige themselves to be dragged by force to the altar, thou who willest none but voluntary sacrifices : therefore, thou reluctantly givest thyself to these ungrateful hearts who unwillingly receive thee ; and, wert thou still capable of being troubled in the spirit, as thou permittedst to be visible over the tomb of Lazarus, ah ! we should once more see thee groaning when thou enteredst those profane mouths which, in thy sight, are only open sepulchres, as they have long been troubled before they could prevail upon themselves to appear here to pay thee that homage.
of

Let us acknowledge then, my dearest brethren, that the faith which makes us to discern the body of Jesus Christ is very rare. We believe, but with a superficial faith, which only skims the surface, as I may say, without entering into the efficacy and the mysteries of this sacrament : we believe, but with an indolent faith, which grounds its whole merit in submitting without opposition : we believe, but with an inconstant faith, which professes to believe, but denies it in works : we believe, but with an human faith, which is the gift rather of our fathers according to the flesh, than of the Father of light : we believe, but with a popular faith, which leaves us only weak and puerile ideas : we believe, but with a superstitious faith, which tends to nothing but vain and external homages : we believe, but with a faith merely of custom, which feels nothing : we believe, but with an insipid faith, which no longer discerns : we believe, but with a convenient faith, which is never followed with any effects : we believe, but with an ignorant faith, which fails either in respect through familiarity, or in love through its backwardness : we believe, but with a faith which enchains the mind, and leaves the heart to wander : lastly, we believe, but with a tranquil and vulgar faith, in which there is nothing either animated, grand, sublime, or worthy of the God which it discovers to us. Ah ! to discern thy body, Lord, through faith, it is to prefer this heavenly bread to all the luxuries of Egypt ; it is to render it the only consolation of our exilement, the tenderest soother of our sufferings, ngs, the sacred remedy of all our evils, the continual desire of our souls ; it is, through it, to find serenity under all the frowns of fortune, peace in all our troubles, and equanimity under all the stings of adversity ; it is to find in it an assylum against our disgraces, a buckler to repel the flaming darts of Satan, a renovated ardour against the unavoidable lukewarmnesses of piety. To discern thy body, Lord, it is to devote more cares, more attention, and more circumspection towards worthily receiving thee, than to all the other actions of life. To discern thy body, Lord, it is to respect the temples in which thou art worshipped, the ministers who serve thee, and our bodies which receive thee. Let every man examine himself, let him thereupon listen to the testimony of his own conscience ; and this is the second preparation, a prudent faith, which makes us to prove ourselves : let a man examine himself.

REFLECTION II. I know that we are unacquainted with our own heart : that the mind of man is not always informed of what takes place in man : that the passions seduce, examples harden, and prejudices drag us away ; that our inclinations are always victorious over our lights ; that the heart is never in the wrong ; that, to examine one's self, is frequently only to harden one's self in error. Such is man, O my God ! delivered up to his own understanding : he is continually deceived, and nothing appears to his eyes but under fictitious

ous

ous colours: he but imperfectly knows thee; he hardly knows himself: he comprehends nothing in all that surrounds him; he takes darkness for light; he wanders from error to error; he quits not his errors when he returns to himself: the lights alone of thy faith can direct his judgments, open the eyes of his soul, become the reason of his heart, teach him to know himself, lay open the folds of self-love, expose all the artifices of the passions, and exalt him to that spiritual man, who conceives and judges of all. By the rules of faith, then, my brethren, must we examine ourselves; all human doctrines, the mollifications of custom, the examples of the multitude, our own understanding, are all deceitful guides: if ever it was of importance not to be deceived, it surely is in a conjuncture where sacrilege is the consequence of mistake.

But upon what shall we examine ourselves? Upon what! Upon the holiness of this sacrament, and upon our own corruption. It is the body of Jesus Christ, it is the bread of angels, it is the Lamb without stain, who admits none around his altar but those who either have not defiled their garment or who have purified them in the blood of penitence. And what art thou, forward soul, whom I see approaching with so much confidence? Bringest thou there thy modesty, thine innocence? Hast thou always possessed the vessel of thy body in honour and in holiness? Hath thy heart not been

been dragged through the filth of a thousand passions? In the sight of God, is not thy soul that blackened brand of which the prophet speaks, which impure flames had blasted and consumed from thine earliest years, and which is no longer but a shocking vestige of their fury? Art thou not totally covered with shameful wounds? Is there a spot upon thy body free from the mark of some crime? Where wilt thou place the body of the Lamb? What! it shall rest upon thy tongue; that pure and immaculate body upon a tomb which hath never exhaled but infection and stench; that body immolated with so much gentleness upon the instrument of all thy vengeance and bitterness; that crucified body on the seat of all thy sensualities and debauches. What! he shall descend to thy heart? But will he therein find where to repose his head? Hast thou not changed that holy temple into a den of thieves? What! thou art going to place him among so many impure pleasures, profane attachments, ambitious projects, emotions of hatred, of jealousy, and of pride; it is amidst all these monsters that thou hast prepared his dwelling-place? Ah! thou deliverest him up to his enemies, thou once more puttest him into the hands of his executioners.

You have examined yourselves, say you to me. Before drawing near you have made your confession. Ah! my brethren, and, with the same mouth from which you have so lately vented all your iniquities, you go to receive Jesus Christ? And, the heart still reeking with a thousand ill-extinguished passions, and which to-morrow shall see in all their wonted vigour, you dare to approach the altar with your present, and to participate in the holy mysteries? And, the imagination still stained with the ideas of those recent excesses which you have just been recounting to the priest, you go to eat of the pure bread of the chosen? What! on your departure from the tribunal the communion, in your eyes, supplies the place, and answers the purposes of penitence? From guilt you rush headlong to the altar? In place of dissolving in tears with the penitent, you come to rejoice with the righteous? In place of nourishing yourself with the bread of tribulation, you run to a delicious feast? In place of lingering at the gate of the temple, like the publican, you confidently draw near to the holy of holies? In former times, a penitent came not to the table of the Lord but after whole years of humiliation, of abstinence, of prayer, and of austerity, and they purified themselves in tears, in grief, and in the public exercises of a painful discipline: they became new men; an heart-felt regret was the only vestige of their former life: no traces of their past crimes were to be recognised but in the grace of penitence, and of the macerations which, at last, had expiated them; and the eucharist was that heavenly bread which no man, a sinner, then eat but with the sweat sweat of his brow. And, at present, to have confessed crimes is believed to have already punished them ; that an absolution, which is only given under the supposition of an humbled and contrite heart, actually creates, and renders it so ; that all the purity required of those who receive the body of Jesus Christ, is, that they have laid open all the virulence and infection of their sores. Unworthy communions, my brethren ; you eat and you drink your damnation : in vain may we comfort you ; can man justify when God condemns ?

Besides, it is pure and without leaven ; it requires to be exempted from leaven to eat of it : now, candidly, have those worldly persons, whom the circumstances of a solemnity determine to approach the holy table, quitted the old leaven in presenting themselves at the altar ? Do they not bring along with them every passion still living in its roots ? Judge thereof from the consequences. On their departure from thence they find themselves exactly the same ; hatreds are not extinguished, the empire of voluptuousness is not weakened, animation in the pursuit of pleasures is not blunted, inclination for the world is not less violent ; in a word, cupidity has lost nothing of its rights. We see no greater precautions than before against dangers already encountered ; the society of the world again resumes its influence ; conversations are renewed ; the passions awaken ; every thing resumes its former train, and, in addition to their former state,

state, they have now to add the profanation of this awful mystery. How is this? It is that a simple confession is no examination of one's self.

Again, it is the food of the strong. A weak, sickly, and wavering soul, who turns with every wind; who gives way to the first obstacle; who founders upon the first rock; who escapes every moment from the guidance of grace; who has a long experience of his own fragility; who never brings to the altar but promises an hundred times violated, but momentary sensations of devotion, which the very first pleasure stifles; who, from his earliest years, has been in the alternate practice of weaknesses and holy things, and who has seen a constant succession of crimes to repentance, and of the sacrament to relapses: is a soul of this description a strong soul? Is it not its duty to examine itself, to increase, to strengthen, and to exercise itself in charity? Scarcely in a state to digest milk, ought it to load itself with solid food, and such as can serve the purposes of nourishment only to the perfect man?

It is written in the law that, if the sin-offering be placed in an earthen vessel, the vessel shall immediately be broken; but, if in a brazen vessel, it shall be both scoured and rinsed in water. Would these circumstances, so carefully and minutely marked, be worthy of the holy Spirit, did they not contain instructions and mysteries? Doth not a weak soul, who receives the true victim, resemble that that earthen vessel which falls in pieces, as I may say, being unable to endure the violence of this sacred fire? On the contrary, the firm soul, like the brass, is purified, loses in it all its stains, and comes out from it more beautiful and brilliant than before. What is the consequence, according to Jesus Christ, of putting new wine into old bottles; do they not burst, and allow the wine to be lost upon the ground? What is the application of this parable? You put the mystical wine, that wine whose strength operates an holy intoxication in pure souls, into a decayed and worn-out heart, which long established passions have almost consumed. Ah! I am not surprised that it is unable to endure its strength, that the blood of Jesus Christ cannot tarry there, and that, on the first occasion, you shed and trample it under foot; it required to have gradually accustomed your heart to it, to have prepared it by retirement, by prayer, by daily conquests over yourself; and, through the means of these continued and salutary trials, to have strengthened and rendered it capable of receiving Jesus Christ.

It is the passover of Christians: now, Jesus Christ celebrates his passover with his disciples alone.

Now, what is it to be his disciples? It is to renounce one's self, to carry his cross, to follow him. Are you mortified in your desires, patient under your afflictions? Do you walk in the ways in which Jesus Christ hath walked before you? To be

be his disciples is mutually to love each other; and how often have you come to eat of this bread of union, how often have you made your appearance at this banquet of charity, your heart inwardly loaded with gall and bitterness against your brother? How often have you come to offer up your present at the altar without having reconciled yourself with him?

Lastly, It is a God so pure, that the stars are dimmed in his presence; so holy, that, after the fall of the angel, heaven was rent and the abyss opened that he might place an eternal chaos between sin and him; so jealous, that a single wandering desire injures and offends him. Thus, my brethren, it is necessary that you examine yourselves upon your own inclinations: are not those desires of the age, of which the apostle speaks, still nourished within you? Render glory to God, and, in his presence, search your hearts to the bottom. I go to eat of the body of Jesus Christ, and to convert it into my own substance; but, when he shall have entered into my soul, he who knows and discerns its intentions and most secret inclinations, will he find nothing there unworthy of the sanctity of his presence? He will immediately proceed to the spring and to the causes of my wanderings; he will examine whether their source be dried up, or their course only suspended; he will perceive what are still the dominant inclinations of my soul, and what is the weight which still turns the balance of my heart : Alas ! will he be enabled to say, as formerly when entering into the house of Zaccheus, “ This day is salvation come to this “ house ? ” Have I sincerely cast off that passion so fatal to my innocence ; that bitterness of heart of which I have so lately expressed my detestation at the feet of the priest ; that idolising of riches which leads me to grasp at even iniquitous profits ; that madness of gaming by which my health, my affairs, and my salvation are injured ; that vexatious and variable temper which the slightest contradiction inflames ; that vanity which leads me to soar above the rank in which my ancestors had left me ; that envy which, with malignant eyes, has always viewed the reputation and the prosperity of my equals ; that proud and censorious air which judges upon all, and never judges itself ; that supreme influence over me of effeminacy and voluptuousness, which are, as it were, interwoven with the foundation and principle of my being ? Has the avowal, which I come from making, of my weaknesses, to the minister of Jesus Christ, rooted them out from my heart ? Am I a new creature ? He alone who is regenerated can aspire to this heavenly bread which I am going to eat : in thine eyes am I so, O my God ? Do I not bear the name of living, though still, in effect, dead ? Will the Mighty, entering into my soul, possess it in peace, and will he not find there seven unclean spirits who shall chase him from it ? Instruct me, Lord, and suffer not that thy thy Christ, that thy holy descend into corruption. Such, my brethren, is the way to examine ourselves. The Lord had formerly forbidden the Jews to offer up honey and leaven in the sacrifices: see if, in approaching the altar, you bring not with you the leaven of your crimes, and the honey of voluptuousness: that is to say, both that relish for the world and for pleasure, and that effeminate and sensual character, enemy of the cross, and incompatible with salvation. Approach not, if you do not feel yourself sufficiently pure: this holy body, says the prophet, would not purge your iniquity, it would only increase it; your religion would be vain, your heart idolatrous, your sacrifice a sacrilege.
balance

Examine, therefore, yourself, and afterwards eat of the heavenly bread. But we are not to stop at the simply discerning and examining. Hitherto you have only removed the obstacles; but you have not settled the last preparations: you have lopt off whatever might repel Jesus Christ from your soul; but you have not acquired what might attract him to it: you have arranged so as not to receive him unworthily; but you have not so as to receive him with fruit: it is not sufficient to be free from guilt; it is necessary to be clothed with righteousness and sanctity: it is little not to betray him like Judas; it is necessary to love him with the other disciples: it is little, in a word, to be no longer profane, worldly, voluptuous, effeminate, nate, proud, and revengeful; it is necessary to be sedate, meek, humble, firm, chaste, believing, Christian. "As oft as ye do this do it in remembrance of me:" this is the third disposition to communicate in remembrance of Jesus Christ.

REFLECTION III. What is it to communicate in remembrance of Jesus Christ? It is, in the first place, internally to describe all that passed in the heart of Jesus Christ in instituting this adorable sacrament. "With desire," said he to his disciples, "I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer." He sighed for that blessed moment; he never lost sight of it; in the remembrance of it he was comforted for all the bitterness of his passion. What did he thereby mean to teach us? Ah! that we ought to bring to this divine table an heart enflamed, penetrated, consumed; an eager, earnest, and impatient heart; an hunger and a thirst after Jesus Christ; an inclination roused by love: in a word, what I have termed a burning desire which impels us to love. This bread, said a father, requires a famished heart. Ah! Lord, says then the believing soul with St Augustin, who will give me that thou mayst enter into my heart to take possession of it; wholly to fill it; to reign there alone; to dwell there with me even to the consummation of ages; to be mine all; there to constitute my purest delights; to shed through it a thousand inward consolations; to satiate, to gladden it, to make me forget my misries, mine anxieties, my vain pleasures, all mankind, the whole universe, and to leave me wholly to thee, to enjoy thy presence, thy conversation, and all the delights which thou preparest for those who love thee? Perhaps, Lord, the tenement of my soul is not yet sufficiently embellished to receive thee; but come and be thyself all its ornament. Perhaps thou perceivest stains which repel thee from it; but thy divine touch will purify them all. Perhaps thou discoverest invisible enemies still there; but art not thou the mighty? Thy sole presence will disperse them, and peace alone will reign there when once thou shalt be in possession of it. Perhaps it has wrinkles which render it forbidding; but thou wilt renew its youth like that of the eagle. Perhaps it is still stained with the blemishes of its former infidelities; but thy blood will wash them entirely out. Come, Lord, and tarry not; every blessing will attend me with thee: despised, persecuted, afflicted, despoiled, calumniated, I will consider as nothing my sorrows from the moment that thou shalt come to alleviate them: honoured, favoured, exalted, surrounded with abundance, these vain prosperities will cease to interest me, will appear as nothing from the moment thou shalt have made me to taste how sweet thou art. Such are the desires which ought to lead us to the altar.

But, alas! many bring there only a criminal disgust and repugnance: occasions are required to induce induce induce them to determine upon it ; of themselves they would never have thought of it. But, what do I say, occasions ? Thunders and anathemas are required. Good God ! that the church should be reduced, through the lukewarmness of Christians, to make a law to them of participating in thy body and in thy blood ! That penalties and threatenings should be required to lead them to thy altar, and to oblige them to seat themselves at thy table ! That the Christian's only felicity upon earth should be a painful precept to him ! That the most glorious privilege with which men can be favoured by thee should be an irksome restraint to them ! Others approach it with an heavy heart, a pallid appetite, a soul wholly of ice : people who live in the commerce of pleasures and of the sacrament ; who participate at the table of Satan and at that of Jesus Christ ; who have stated days for the Lord and days allotted for the age : people to whom a communion costs only a day of restraint and reservation ; who, on that day, neither gamble, shew themselves, see company, nor speak evil. But this exertion goes no further ; all devotion ceases with the solemnity ; it is a deed of ceremony ; after this short suspension they are at ease with themselves ; they tranquilly return to their former ways ; for that was a point agreed upon with themselves ; they smoothly continue to live in this mixture of holy and of profane : the sacrament calms us upon pleasures ; pleasures to be more tranquil on the side of the conscience lead us to the sacrament ; and they are almost good in order to be worldly without scruple. Thus they bring to the altar a taste cloyed with the amusements and the delights of the age, with the embarrassments of affairs, with the tumult of the passions : they feel not the ineffable sweets of this heavenly food ; they retrace, even at the foot of the throne of grace, the images of those pleasures they have so lately left : interests which occupy us, projects which puzzle us, ideas which force us from the altar to drag us back to the world, make much deeper impressions upon the heart than the presence of Jesus Christ. But is it not, Lord, against those monsters of Christians that thy prophet, incensed, formerly said to thee, “ Ah ! Lord, let thy table become a snare before them ; and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap.”

sic

In the second place, to communicate in remembrance of Jesus Christ, is to wish to awaken, through the presence of this sacred pledge, every impression which his memory can make upon an heart which loves him. The firmest bonds are loosened by absence: Jesus Christ well foresaw that, ascending up to heaven, his disciples would insensibly forget his kindnesses and his divine instructions. Alas ! Moses remains only forty days upon the mountain, and already the Israelites cease to remember the miracles that he had wrought to deliver them from Egypt. We wot not, said they
among

among themselves, what is become of this Moses, the man that brought us out of the land of Egypt; let us make gods who shall go before and defend us against our enemies. Jesus Christ, to guard against these inconstancies of the human heart, wished, in ascending to the heavenly Sion, to leave us a pledge of his presence: it is there that he wishes we should come to console ourselves for his sensible absence; it is there that we ought to find a more lively remembrance of his wonders, of his doctrine, of his kindneses, of his divine person; it is there that, under mysterious signs, we come to see him born at Bethlehem, brought up at Nazareth, holding discourse with men, and traversing the cities of Judea, working signs and miracles which no one before him had ever done, calling as followers rude disciples, in order to make them masters of the world, confounding the hypocrisy of the Pharisees, announcing salvation to men, leaving marks every where of his power and goodness, entering in triumph into Jerusalem, led to mount Calvary, expiring upon a cross, conqueror of death and of hell, leading with him into heaven those who were captives as the trophies of his victory, and forming afterwards his church with the overflowing of his spirit and the abundance of his gifts; in a word, we shall there find him in all his mysteries.

You envy, said St Chryostom, the lot of a woman who touches his garments, of a sinful one who bathes his feet with her tears, of the women of Galilee who had the happiness to follow and to serve him in the course of his ministry, of his disciples with whom he familiarly conversed, of the people of those times who listened to the words of grace and of salvation which proceeded from his mouth; you call blessed those who saw him; many prophets and kings have vainly wished it; but you, my brethren, come to the altars and you shall see him; you shall touch him; you shall give him an holy kiss, you shall bathe him with your tears, and your bowels shall bear him even like those of Mary. Alas! our fathers went into the holy land to worship the traces of his feet, and the places that he had consecrated with his presence. Here, they were told, he proposed the parable of the good shepherd and the lost sheep; here he reconciled an adulteress; here he comforted a sinful woman; here he sanctified the marriage and the feast with his presence; here he multiplied the loaves to fill a famished multitude; here he checked his disciples who wanted to bring fire from heaven upon a criminal city; here he deigned to hold converse with a woman of Samaria; here he suffered the children around him, and rebuked those who wanted to drive them away; here he restored sight to the blind, made the lame to walk, delivered those possessed with devils, made the dumb to speak, and the deaf to hear. At these words our fathers felt themselves transported with an holy joy; they shed tears of tenderness and of religion religion upon that blessed land ; this sight, these images, carried them back to the times, to the actions, to the mysteries of Jesus Christ, inspired them with fresh ardour, and consoled their faith ; sinners found there a sweet trust, the weak a new force, and the righteous new desires.
of

Ah ! Christians ; no, it is not necessary to cross the seas ; salvation is at your hand ; the word which we preach to you will be, if you wish it, upon your mouth and in your heart : open the eyes of faith, behold these altars ; they are not places consecrated formerly with the presence, it is Jesus Christ himself : approach in remembrance of him ; come to rekindle all that your heart hath ever felt of tender, affecting, and lively, for this divine Saviour. Let the remembrance of his meekness, which would not permit him to break the reed already bruised, nor to extinguish the yet glimmering lamp, quiet your transports and your impatiencies : let the remembrance of his toils and of his troublesome life overwhelm you for your effeminacy : let the remembrance of his modesty and of his humility, which made him fly when they wanted to make him king, cure you of your vanities, of your schemes, of your frivolous pretensions : let the remembrance of his fast for forty days reproach you for your sensualities : let the remembrance of his zeal against the profaners of the temple teach you with what respect, and with what holy dread you ought to enter there : let the remembrance of the simplicity and the frugality of his manners condemn the vain superfluities and the excesses of yours : let the remembrance of his retirement and of his prayers warn you to fly the world, to retire sometimes into the secrecy of your house, to pass, at least, some portion of the day in the indispensable practice of prayer : let the remembrance of his tender compassion for a famished people give you bowels of commiseration for the unfortunate : let the remembrance of his holy discourses teach you to converse innocently, holily, and profitably with men : in a word, let the remembrance of all his virtues, there more lively, more present to the heart and to the mind, correct you of all your weaknesses : this is what is called to communicate in remembrance of him.
simplicity

But, to bring continually to the altar the same weaknesses ; to familiarise ourselves in such a manner with the body of Jesus Christ, that it no longer awakens in us a new sentiment, but leaves us always such as we are ; to nourish ourselves with a divine food, yet not to increase ; frequently to approach this burning furnace without any additional heat to your lukewarmness ; to appear there with faults an hundred times detested yet still dear, with habits of imperfection, which, though light in themselves, are no longer so, however, through the attachment and the bent which render them inevitable to us, and through the circumstance of the sacrament which there is the risk of profaning ; to make profession of piety, of estrangement from the world, to be almost every day in the commerce of holy things, and to have determined, as it were, upon a limited point of virtue beyond which never to rise, and, after ten years exercise of piety, to be no farther advanced than at first, on the contrary, to have rather relaxed from the first fervour; to be continually applying to this divine remedy, yet to feel no alteration for the better in the disease; to heap sacrament upon sacrament, if I may dare to say so, yet never to empty the heart in order to make room for this heavenly food; to nourish envies, animosities, secret attachments, a fund of sensuality, of vain desires to please, to be courted, to be prosperous; to permit, in conversation, the habit of witticisms and every freedom of speech upon others, of endless nothings, of sentiments wholly profane, of quibbles which wound sincerity, of concealments by which falsehood becomes familiar, of hastinesses and bursts of passion; to be jealous to an extreme wherever self is concerned; to rise indignant at the smallest appearance of neglect, and to be incapable of digesting a single disobliging gesture; and yet, with all this, to feed upon the bread of angels; O my God! how much less than this ought to make us tremble!
make

But, is it to eat of this bread unworthily, to eat it with so many imperfections and weaknesses? Who knows this, O Lord, but thee? All that we know is, that it is not communicating in remembrance of thee ; that many righteousnesſes ſhall appear in thy ſight, at the great day, as a ſoiled cloth ; that many, who had even propheſied in thy name, ſhall be rejected ; and that every thing is to be dreaded in this ſtate. Peter is not admitted to thy ſupper till after thou hadſt waſhed his feet ; nevertheleſs, thou aſſureſt us that he was altogether pure. Magdalene is ſent away, and thou ſayeſt unto her, “ Woman, touch me not,” becauſe a too ſenſible affection was the cauſe of her eagerneſs ; and, nevertheleſs, her love had been great, and ſhe had waſhed thy ſacred feet and her own ſins with her tears. And we, Lord, full of wants, empty of ſincere fruits of penitence, made up wholly of effeminacy and ſenſualities, lukewarm and without deſire, fixed in a certain ſtate of languiſhing and imperfect piety, more ſuſtained by habitude and the engagements of an holy profeſſion than by thy grace, or by a lively and ſolid faith, alas ! we make thy body our ordinary food. What inexplicable gulphs, Lord ! What a train of crimes, perhaps, not known, unrepented of, multiplied to infinity, and which are as the ſhoot upon which a thouſand new profanations are afterwards grafted ! What gulphs, once more ! And what terrible ſecrets ſhall thy light make manifeſt to us at the great day ! In thy ſight, O my God, what am I ! I can neither offend nor pleaſe thee by halves ; my condition admits not of thoſe middle ſtates of virtue which hold, as it were, a mid way betwixt innocence and guilt ;

guilt; if not a faint, I am a monster; if not a vessel of honour, I am a vessel of shame; if not an angel of light, there is no room to hesitate, I am an angel of darkness; and, if not a living temple of thy spirit, I must be its profaner. Good God! what powerful motives for vigilance, for self-examination, for circumspection, for approaching thine altars with trembling; for humility, tears, and compunction, while waiting the manifestation of thine adorable judgments! But still, my brethren, it is not enough to communicate in remembrance of Jesus Christ; and, in order to retrace his life, it is likewise necessary, and this is the last disposition, to renew the remembrance of his death, and to shew him whenever we eat of his body and drink of his blood; and this is what I call a noble faith which leads us to sacrifice.

REFLECTION IV. As oft as you shall eat of the body and drink of the blood of the Lord, you will shew his death until the kingdom of God shall come. How this? Literally speaking his death is shewn, because this mystery was a prelude to his passion; because Judas there determined to betray him; because Jesus Christ, eager to undergo that baptism of blood with which he was to be baptised, anticipated its fulfilment, and sacrificed himself beforehand by the mystical separation of his body and of his blood; because the eucharist is the permanent sacrifice of the church, the fruit and the fulness of that of the cross: lastly, because Jesus Christ

Christ is there as in a state of death ; he hath a mouth and speaks not ; eyes and uses them not ; feet and walks not. But, my brethren, in that sense the impious, equally as the just man, shews the death of the Lord as oft as he eats of his body : it is a mystery, and not a merit ; it is the nature of the sacrament, and not the privilege of him who receives it ; it is a consequence of its institution, and not a disposition for approaching it. Now, the design of the apostle here, is to prevent the abuses, to instruct believers how to eat worthily of the body of the Lord, to explain to them, in the mysteries contained in this sacrament, the dispositions which it requires. There is a way, therefore, of shewing the death of the Lord, which should be wholly in our hearts, which disposes and prepares us, which fits the situation of our soul to the nature of this mystery, which makes us to bear upon our body the mortification of Jesus Christ, which immolates and crucifies us with him. Let us resume the reasons we have touched upon, and change the letter into spirit.

1stly, The death of the Lord is shewn, because this mystery was a prelude to his passion. In former times the eucharist was a prelude to martyrdom. From the moment that the rage of the tyrant was declared, and the persecution begun, all the believers run to provide themselves with this bread of life ; they carried this precious trust into their houses : death seemed less terrible to them when they had before their eyes the beloved pledge of their immortality: they even desired it; and the ineffable consolations which the presence of Jesus Christ, hidden under mystical veils, already shed through their soul, made them to long for that torrent of delight with which he will overflow his chosen when they shall behold him face to face. Were they dragged to prison, and, like felons, loaded with irons, they of whom the world was unworthy; they carefully concealed the divine eucharist in their bosom; they feasted upon it in the hope of martyrdom; they grew fat upon this heavenly food like pure victims, that their sacrifice might be more pleasing to the Lord. Chaste virgins, fervent believers, holy ministers, partook altogether of the blessed bread: and what delight even in their chains! What serenity of mind in these dark and gloomy abodes! What songs of thanksgiving in these horrible places where the eye encountered nothing but the sad images of death, and preparations for the most cruel tortures! How often did they say to Jesus Christ, present with them in this adorable sacrament: Ah! we fear no ill, Lord, since thou art with us: though hosts surround us yet will we not be afraid; our enemies may destroy our bodies, but thou wilt restore them to us glorious and immortal; for who can destroy those whom the Father hath bestowed upon thee? Blessed chains which thou deignest to sustain! Holy prisons which thou consecratest with thy
when

thy presence ! Beloved dungeons in which thou fillest our souls with so many lights ! Precious death which is to unite us with thee, and to withdraw the veil which conceals thee from our sight ! Thence what fortitude under their tortures ! Filled with the body of Jesus Christ, washed in his blood, they quitted their prisons, says an holy father, like lions out of their den still raging and thirsting for death and carnage ; they flew upon the scaffolds, and, with an holy pride, launched here and there looks of confidence and magnanimity which appalled the most ferocious tyrants, and even disarmed their executioners : they shewed then the death of the Lord in preparing themselves for martyrdom by the communion.

The tranquility of our ages, and the religion of the Cæsars leave us no longer the same hope ; death is no longer the reward of faith, and the eucharist makes no more martyrs : but have we not domestic persecutors ? Has our faith only tyrants to dread ? And is there not a martyrdom of love as well as of blood ? In approaching the altars then, my brethren, a believing soul sighs for the dissolution of his mortal body ; for, could he love this life, and shew the death of Jesus Christ, and renew, in these mystical signs, his quitting the world to go to his Father ? He complains of the length of his exilement ; he bears, to the foot of the sanctuary, a spirit of death and of martyrdom : “ Ah !
“ Lord, since thou art dead and crucified to the “ world,

“ world, why detain me there? What can I find “ upon the earth worthy of my heart, seeing thou “ art no longer there? The mystery itself, which “ should console me through thy presence, recalls “ to me thy death: these covers which veil thee
 “ are an artifice of thy love; and thou hast con“ cealed thyself only to inspire my heart with the “ desire of fully beholding thee. Vain things, “ what offer ye to me but an empty shadow of the “ God whom I seek? What answer do ye make “ when my softened heart bends towards you to “ soothe its anxieties? Return, say you, to him “ who hath made us; we groan in awaiting his “ coming to deliver us from this servitude, which “ makes us subservient to the passions and to the “ errors of men: seek him not among us, thou wilt
 “ not find him, he is risen, he is no longer here;
 “ if he appear it is only to die again; recall the “ desires and the affections which thou meant to “ place upon us, and turn them towards heaven;
 “ the bridegroom hath been carried away, the “ earth is no longer for a Christian now but a “ vale of mourning and tears: such is what they “ answer to me. What then detains me here, “ Lord? What are the ties and the charms which “ can attach me to the world? Restless in plea“ sures, impatient in absence, tired of the conver“ sations and the commerce of men, afraid of soli“ tude; without relish for the world, without relish
 “ for virtue; doing the evil I would not, and leav“ ing

“ ing undone the good that I would ; what keeps “ me here ? What delays the dissolution of this “ body of sin ? What prevents me from soaring “ with the wings of the dove upon the holy moun“ tain ? I feel that I should then be happy ; I could “ then feast at all times upon this delicious bread :
 “ I taste no real delight but at the feet of thy al“ tars ; these are, indeed, the happiest moments
 “ of my life : but they are so short, and I must so “ soon return to the insipidities and to the disgusts “ of the world ; I am under the necessity of being “ so long absent from thee : no, Lord, there is no “ perfect happiness on the earth, and death is a “ gain to whoever knows to love thee.”

Are these our sentiments, my brethren, when we draw near to the altars ? Where are now the Christians who, like the first believers, await the blessed hope, and hasten, by their sighs, the end of their banishment, and the coming of Jesus Christ ?
 This is a refinement of piety of which they have no idea ; it is merely a language of the speculist ;
 it is, however, the ground-work of religion, and the first step of faith. The necessity of dying is considered as a cruel punishment ; the sole idea of death, with which our fathers were so comforted, makes us to shudder ; the end of life is the term of our pleasures in place of being that of our sufferings ; the attentions paid to the body are endless ; our precautions extend even to absurdity ; or, if it sometimes happen that this last moment is desired,

fired, it is in consequence of being wearied of life and of its chagrins ; it is a disgrace, an habitual infirmity preying upon us, a revolution in our worldly matters which leaves no more pleasures to be expected here below, the disappointment of an establishment, a death, an accident, or, lastly, a disgust and a wish of self-love ; we tire of being unfortunate, but we are not eager to go to be reunited with Jesus Christ : and, with all this, they come to eat of the Lord's supper, to renew the remembrance of his passion, and to shew his death until he shall come ; what an outrage !

2dly, His death is shewn in this mystery, because Judas there finally determined upon delivering him up. Now, what does this remembrance exact of us ? Ah ! my brethren, an ardent desire of repairing, by our homages, the impiety of so many shocking communions which crucify Jesus Christ afresh. So many impure, revengeful, worldly, and extortioning sinners, of every people and of every nation, receive him into profane mouths : we ought to feel the insults which Jesus Christ thereby suffers ; to humble ourselves before him, seeing that his most signal blessing is become the occasion of the greatest crimes ; to tremble for ourselves ; to admire his goodness, which, for the profit of a small number of chosen, hath graciously been willing to submit to the indignities of that endless multitude of sinners, of all ages and of all times, who have, and still continue to dishonour him ; to avert, by the tears of our heart and a thousand inward lamentations, the scourges which unworthy communions never fail to draw down upon the earth. For, if the apostle formerly lamented that general plagues, epidemical diseases, and sudden deaths were only a consequence of the profanation of the sacrament; ah! thy finger has long been upon us, Lord; the cup of thy wrath is poured out upon our cities and provinces; thou armett kings against kings, and nations against nations: nothing is now spoken of but battles and the rumours of war; our fields are stricken with sterility; our families are consumed by the sword of the enemy, and the father is deprived of the only prop and consolation of his old age; we groan under burdens, which, though keeping the enemy of the state from our walls, yet leave us a prey to famine and want; the arts are now almost of no avail to the people; commerce languishes, and industry can hardly supply the common necessaries of life; yet what are even the public calamities, when compared with the private miseries known to thee alone? We have seen our citizens mowed down by hunger and death, and our cities turned into frightful deserts; the enemy of thy name takes advantage of our dissensions, and usurps thine inheritance.

Whence proceed these scourges, great God! so continued and so terrible? Where are formed those clouds of wrath and indignation which have so long been pouring out their torrents upon us? Is it
it

it not to punish the sacrilegious that thou art armed? Do not the outrages which are every day committed against thy body, at the feet of the altars, draw down upon us these marks of thy wrath? O strike us then, Lord, and avenge thy glory; stop not the arm of thy angel who hovers over us; let the houses where the traces of a profane blood are still imprinted not be spared; thine anger is just. But no, give us not the water of gall to drink because we have sinned against thee; give peace in our days; listen to the cries of the righteous who entreat it of thee: "Lord," say they with the prophet, "we looked for peace, but no good came; and for a time of health, and behold trouble." Terminate the profanations which are ever the attendants of wars; cease to punish sacrileges by multiplying them on the earth; once more restore majesty to so many temples profaned, worship and dignity to so many churches despoiled, peace to our cities, abundance to our families, consolation and gladness of heart to Israel; let the child be restored to his father, and the husband to the desolate wife; and, if our evils touch thee not, O pay attention to the miseries of thy church.

3dly, The death of the Lord is shewn in this mystery, for Jesus Christ sacrifices himself in it, by the mystical separation of his body and of his blood. What follows from thence? That we must be at the foot of the altar as if we were at the foot of the cross: that we must enter into the dispositions of

of

of the disciples and of the women of Jerufalem who received the dying figh of Jefus, and were prefent at the confummation of his facrifice. Now, what hatred had they not againft a world which had crucified their Mafter? What meafures did they think it neceffary to keep with his murderers? Were they afraid of declaring themfelves the difciples of him who had fo openly declared himfelf their Saviour, and that at the price of his blood? Did they not fay to the heavenly Father, Ah! ftrike us, Lord, who are the guilty, and fpare the innocent. What horror at their paff faults, which had attached fo good a Mafter to the crofs! What a lively impreffion in their heart of his fufferings! Thus, my brethren, ftill to keep meafures with the age, to be afraid of declaring openly for piety, to be afhamed of the crofs of Jefus Chrift, to calculate your works of devotion in fuch a way that an air and a favour of the world may ftill pervade the whole: not boldly to confefs Jefus Chrift; to be afraid of abftaining from a theatre where he is infulted, from an affembly where he is offended, from a proceeding by which innocence muft fuffer, from I know not what train of life of which the world makes a neceffity to you, from certain maxims which wound the gofpel, and which cuftom has eftablifhed as laws; to pretend to keep up all thefe conciliatory meafures with the world, and yet to come to eat the paffover with the difciples of Jefus Chrift; to preferve a correpondence with his enemies, and yet to seat yourselves at his table; to esteem the maxims which crucify him, and yet to wish to be the spectators and the faithful companions of his cross; ah! it is a contradiction.
his

He hath overcome the world; he hath fixed it to his cross: along with himself he hath given death to its maxims and errors: consequently, to shew his death in the communion is to renew the memory of his victory. And, if the world lives and still reigns in your heart, my brother, do you not annihilate the fruit of his death? Do you not contest with Jesus Christ the honour of his triumph? And, in place of shewing his death, do you not come to renew it with his enemies?

Besides, in the fourth place, his death is shewn in this mystery, for it is the consummation of the sacrifice of the cross, and he applies the fruit of it to us. Now, what gives us a right to the fruit of the cross, and, consequently, to the communion? Sufferance, mortification, and a penitent and inward life. For, say, living in delights, shall you dare to nourish a body, like yours, enervated by pleasures, flattered, carested; shall you dare, I say, to nourish it with a crucified body? Shall you dare to incorporate Jesus Christ, dying and crowned with thorns, with delicate and sensual members? Would this connection not be horrible? Will you dare, by converting his body into your own substance, to transform it into an effeminate and voluptuous body? Ah! it would be the perfection of iniquity. To be nourished with the body of Jesus Christ your members must become his members ; his body must take the figure of your body. Now, his body is a crucified body ; his members are suffering members : and, if you live without suffering ; if you bear not upon your body the mortification of Jesus Christ ; if, perhaps, you have never practised a single instance of self-denial ; if your days are passed in a tranquil effeminacy ; if afflictions excite impatience ; if you feel hurt at every thing which opposes your humour ; if you prescribe to yourself no works of mortification ; if those sent to you by heaven are unwillingly and unthankfully received ; how will you that you unite your body to that of Jesus Christ ? This is never reflected upon, my brethren ; and, nevertheless, a soft and sensual life can be a presage only of an unworthy communion.
of

Lastly, The death of the Lord is shewn in this mystery, for he is there himself as in a state of death. He hath a mouth and speaketh not ; eyes and useth them not ; feet and walketh not. View then, my brother, and act according to this model ; behold how you ought to shew his death in partaking of his body : you must bring there eyes instructed to be closed for the earth ; a tongue accustomed to silence, or to sayings of God, as St Paul says ; feet and hands immovable for the works of sin ; senses either extinguished or mortified : in a word, to bring there an universal death over

over your body : the state of Jesus Christ in the eucharist is the state of the Christian on earth ; a state of retreat, of silence, of patience, of humiliation, of divorce from the senses. For, what is Jesus Christ in the eucharist ? He is in the world as if not there ; he is in the midst of men, but invisible ; he hears their vain discourses, their chimerical plans, their frivolous expectations, but he enters not into them ; he sees their solitudes, their agitations, and their enterprises, and he allows them to act ; divine honours are paid to him, and he is insulted ; and, ever the same, he seems insensible alike to the insults as to the homages : he looks on while families, empires, and ages are renewed ; manners are changed ; the taste of men and of ages are incessantly fluctuating : he sees customs sink into decay and then revive ; the figure of this world in an eternal revolution ; his inheritance divided ; wars, seditions, and unexpected revolutions ; the whole universe shaken ; and he is tranquil upon its ruins ; and nothing withdraws him from his close and ineffable study of his Father ; and nothing interrupts the divine quiet of his sanctuary, where he is always living for the purpose of interceding for us. Once more, consider and act according to this model : let us bring to the sacred table eyes long since closed upon every thing which may hurt our soul ; a tongue surrounded with a guard of circumspection and of modesty ; ears chaste and impenetrable

to

to the hissings of the serpent, and to the luxury of those sounds and voices so calculated to soften the heart; a soul alike insensible to scorn or to praise; a soul beyond the reach of the things of this earth, and proof against all the revolutions of life; the same in good or in bad fortune; viewing, with indifferent eyes, every occurrence here below; esteeming the good or the evil which occur to him as a matter that does not regard him; and, through all the agitations of the earth, the tumult of the senses, the contradiction of tongues, the vain enterprises of men, always watchful to guard over his peace of heart, to move continually with a steady pace towards eternity, never to lose sight of his God, and to have his conversation always in heaven.

Not that I would exclude from the altar all those who have not yet attained to this state of death: alas! it is the business of a whole life; and the body of Jesus Christ is an aid established to fortify and to assist us in this undertaking. But, our inclination ought to bend to it, lest we approach the altar unworthily; we must be at open war with the senses, with our own corruption, with our own weaknesses, and be continually gaining the advantage in some article; Christian self-denial must be practised; the daily victories, which the impressions of the world and of the senses gain over us, must be expiated by retirement, by silence, by tears, and by prayer; we must rise with fresh vigour gour from every backsliding. But, I mean you to understand that a communion is not the concern of a day, or of a solemnity; that our whole life ought to be a preparation for the eucharist; that all our actions should be as steps which lead us up to the altar; that the life of too many in the world, even of those who are not in debauchery, who restrict themselves upon nothing, who live according to the senses, who are warm only on the interests of the earth, is a life which shews not the death of the Lord, and which, consequently, excludes you from this mystery. I mean you to comprehend, that the eucharist is a festival, if I dare to say so, of mourning and death; that delights, pleasures, and vain decorations disfigure this sacred table, and occasion your being rejected equally as him who appears there without the wedding-garment: that the meats of the earth and the bread of heaven cannot be eaten at the same time; and that, on the morrow after the Israelites had eaten of the old corn of the land of Canaan, the manna ceased, neither had they any more of that heavenly food. I mean you to comprehend, that this sacrament is the fruit and not the mark of penitence; that those communions, determined by a solemnity, give rise to more profaners than true worshippers; that the body of Jesus Christ cannot be eaten without living by his spirit; that the plenitude of the holy spirit must even rest upon a soul, as upon Mary, before Jesus Christ can enter into it, as it were, to assume once more the human nature. I mean you to comprehend, that the reading of the holy books, and the salutary rigours of penitence, should prepare an abode in our hearts for Jesus Christ, to the end that we may be like holy arks, and that this heavenly manna may rest there amidst the tables of the law and the rod of Aaron. I mean you to understand, that nothing should alarm you more, you who live in the dangers of the age and who love them, than all the communions of which you have partaken without preparation. I mean you to understand, that the bread of life becomes a poison to the majority of believers; that the altars witness almost more crimes than the theatre; that Jesus Christ is more insulted in his sanctuary than in the assemblies of sinners; and that the solemnities are no longer but mysteries of mourning for him, and days set apart to dishonour him. I mean you, in a word, to understand, that, in order to approach it worthily, a respectful faith is required which enables us to discern; a prudent faith which leads us to examine ourselves; a lively faith which causes us to love; a noble faith which induces us to sacrifice ourselves: without these it is rendering one's self guilty of the body and of the blood of the Lord; it is eating and drinking their own condemnation.

Ah, Lord! how little have I hitherto known the innocence and the extreme purity which thou requirest of those who come to eat of this heavenly
ly

ly food ! The Centurion, that man of so fervent, so humble, and so enlightened a faith ; that man so rich in good works, who loved thy people, who raised up edifices to thy name, and appropriated them to public prayers, and to the interpretation of thy scriptures ; that man does not think himself worthy even to receive thee in his house : even the purest of virgins, when informed by thy angel that thou wert to descend into her womb, is terrified at it ; she contemplates her own nothingness ; and, if the power of speech still remains to her, it is to ask, how can this be ? And who am I, Lord, to dare to seat myself at thy table with so little precaution ? I, who come to appear empty before thee ; who have nothing to offer to thee but the refuse of an heart so long engrossed by the world ; who am thine only by intervals, and who still leaves to the created and to the passions the main part of my heart ; who bring to thine altars only weak essays of salvation, and consummated works of sin ; who have nothing above other sinners but the abuse of thy blessings ; but unavailing lights ; but sentiments which evaporate in vain wishes ; but a thousand inspirations, which gain nothing from me but fruitless steps to conversion ; but an heart incapable of familiarising itself either with sin or with virtue ; but a disposition naturally good, and almost intuitively inimical to excess and to vice, and which I, however, have spoiled.

Ah,

Ah, Lord! the fruits of an holy communion are so abundant, so sensible; the soul quits it so overflowed with thy blessings and thy grace, that, when I had no other proof of the unworthiness of my communions than their inefficacy, I ought to tremble and be humbled. When thy body is eaten worthily, we are told that the hunger is not allayed; and I withdraw from that sacred table wearied out, and tired of mine homages: I breathe, on quitting it, as on quitting a drudgery, or an affair to which ceremony alone calls me; I congratulate myself that it is over, as I would do on being rid of a painful undertaking; and, if I feel any relish excited, it is for the world and for pleasures. When thy body is eaten worthily, we abide in thee, and thou abidest in us; that is to say, that thy precious blood, which still flows in our veins, leaves us thy inclinations, thy traits, thy resemblance, and that we are another thee; noble and heavenly inclinations should alone be seen in us, and sentiments worthy of the blood we have received: and, nevertheless, I always find in me only terrestrial desires, mean and groveling tendencies, and an heart still crawling in the dirt, and incapable of soaring above the created, and of returning to thy bosom from whence it came. When thy body is eaten worthily, thou tellest us that we live for thee, and eternally; and I have continued to live for the world, for myself, for those around me, for my pleasures, for my schemes of advancement, for mine affairs, for a family, for children, for my glory; for you, scarcely a single moment in the day. What then must I do, Lord? Must I retire from thy table? What! this fruit of life should be forbidden me? What! the bread of consolation should no longer be broken for me? No, Lord, thou dost not mean to exclude me from it, but only that I be prepared for it; thou refuseth me not the bread of children, but thou wouldst that mine unworthiness force thee not to give me a serpent in place of it. Prepare then thyself in mine heart an abode worthy of thee; make the rough and crooked ways of it smooth, and let the heights be levelled; purify my desires; correct my inclinations, or rather create within me new ones. Thou alone canst be thy precursor, and prepare the way for thee in souls. Fill us then, Lord, with thy spirit, to the end that we may eat of thy body worthily, and live eternally for thee.
for

Now, to God, &c.

F I N I S.

